Acknowledgments

I am so thankful to my colleagues, my students, and my family for everything that they contributed to this book.

First, I am grateful to my colleague Suzanne Rowe who took a chance on me so many years ago and who took her pink pen to every page of this book. There is no way I will ever be able to repay her.

I am also thankful to my colleagues Liz Frost, Joan Rocklin, and Anne Mullins who read portions of the book, provided feedback, and were willing to test my ideas with their students.

I also owe a debt of gratitude to several institutions. First, I am grateful to the Deans at my own institution, the University of Oregon School of Law, for providing me with research grants that allowed me to carve out the time to dedicate to this project. I am also grateful to the Association of Legal Writing Directors, which funded the Scholars' Workshop at which I was able to share some of my work with Kim Holst, Steve Johansen, and Valerie Munson. And of course, I am grateful to those three colleagues for their ideas and insights.

I am thankful, too, to the students who patiently worked their way through the first drafts of this book and provided feedback. I owe special thanks to research assistants Elayna Zammarelli, Lindsay Massara, and Clint Burke who looked carefully at each chapter and shared their thoughts and ideas.

Perhaps most importantly, I am grateful to my family for the sacrifices they made to make this book possible. My parents, Forrest and Karen Bell, spent many years investing in me as a student and a writer. My husband, Jay McAlpin, spent many long evenings and weekends caring for our two young daughters to make it possible for me to write. He also spent many long hours convincing me that I could, in fact, finish this book. And I am grateful to my girls, Jillian and Charlotte, who were patient with me and who I hope will someday read this book and know how valuable that patience was.
