Dedications

To my parents. If not for them and their insistence on being the best I could be, I would not be who and where I am today. I also dedicate this to the persons this volume is about: the innocents who languish in prison, who go unheard despite repeated cries for help, and whose unwanted sacrifice will hopefully pave the way so that others in the future will not endure what they have. Finally, I dedicate this volume to the attorneys, judges, journalists, policymakers, scientists, and others who work to right the wrongs of our criminal justice system.

—ADR

To Jenny, Elizabeth, Anna, Ethan, and Zoe; whether stepping back to reminisce about times past or moving forward in anticipation of times not yet revealed, I could not be happier than to be in such fine company. And let us all dedicate ourselves toward establishing a more perfect union in which justice carries the day.

—JRA

To my family, whose never-ending love and support in all that I do inspires me to keep going. And to Caitlyn, for her incredible patience with me, and for understanding when I have to work late nights or on weekends (even when it is her birthday). For those who have been wronged by the criminal justice system and those who work tirelessly on their behalf, I hope this volume can be but one small contribution toward making things just a little bit better.

—RJN

To my mom, my dad, and my stepdad; and to Vin, my brothers, and my stepsons. Thanks for expecting, demanding, and encouraging the best of me. And to Alan Newton, who I never met. A 2006 New York Times article reported his exoneration and the loose-fitting designer suit, bought by a childhood friend, Newton wore when he was released from prison. That story, and the photos of him in that suit, broke my heart and solidified my commitment to help reduce the number of stories like his that must be told.

Acknowledgments

We first thank the good folks at Carolina Academic Press. Without exception, they all have been wonderful to work with. In particular, Beth Hall and Tasha Pippin have shepherded us through the process from beginning to end with enthusiastic and unwavering support. This is the first edited volume for three of the four editors, and Beth and her colleagues were always there to respond to our questions and concerns.

We also thank the authors who contributed to this volume. We have enjoyed working with you all and we so very much appreciate the time and thoughtfulness you put into your individual chapters. We consider ourselves lucky to be able to work with such fine colleagues.
