CRIMINAL PROCEDURE: CONSTITUTIONAL CONSTRAINTS UPON INVESTIGATION AND PROOF
Seventh Edition
LexisNexis Law School Publishing
Advisory Board

William Araiza
Professor of Law
Brooklyn Law School

Ruth Colker
Distinguished University Professor & Heck-Faust Memorial Chair in Constitutional Law
Ohio State University, Moritz College of Law

Olympia Duhart
Associate Professor of Law
Nova Southeastern University, Shepard Broad Law School

Samuel Estreicher
Dwight D. Opperman Professor of Law
Director, Center for Labor and Employment Law
NYU School of Law

David Gamage
Assistant Professor of Law
UC Berkeley School of Law

Joan Heminway
College of Law Distinguished Professor of Law
University of Tennessee College of Law

Edward Imwinkelried
Edward L. Barrett, Jr. Professor of Law
UC Davis School of Law

Paul Marcus
Haynes Professor of Law
William and Mary Law School

Melissa Weresh
Director of Legal Writing and Professor of Law
Drake University Law School
Dedication

J.J.T.
To Nancy, Vivian, Michelle, Henry, and, of course, Welsh
W.S.W.
To Linda, Kathy, and Ryan
This seventh edition of Criminal Procedure: Constitutional Constraints Upon Investigation and Proof is the second revision since the untimely passing of my valued collaborator and friend, Welsh White. I continue to be inspired by his inimitable spirit and determination. I cannot look at the text, much less focus on its improvement, without triggering fond memories of our productive and gratifying collaboration. Throughout the process of planning and revising the casebook once again, I have made every effort to remain true to the vision and objectives that first motivated the two of us to undertake the project twenty-five years ago. It is my sincere hope that Welsh would approve of the modifications I have made in this iteration of the casebook.

From the outset, this book has been intended for use in an introductory Criminal Procedure course that focuses entirely on issues raised by pretrial law enforcement investigatory practices. The principal topics covered are searches and seizures, entrapment, confessions, identification procedures, and the courtroom rules that command the suppression of evidence. The seventh edition adheres to the same overall structure and addresses the same subjects. Many of the changes made are of the sort to be expected in any effort to update a casebook and are the product of new developments in the law. Other modifications, the products of serious reflection upon the internal structure of selected chapters, may surprise those familiar with the text.

Predictably, the revision incorporates the significant Supreme Court opinions handed down since publication of the sixth edition. The four new main cases are: Arizona v. Gant (searches of vehicles incident to arrests of recent occupants); J. D. B. v. North Carolina (age as a factor in Miranda custody determinations); Berghuis v. Thompkins (standards for waivers of Miranda protections); and Herring v. United States (“good faith” exception to Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule). New decisions that are summarized in notes include: United States v. Jones; Florence v. Board of Chosen Freeholders of County of Burlington; Virginia v. Moore; Michigan v. Fisher; Kentucky v. King; Arizona v. Johnson; Safford Unified School District #1 v. Redding; Howes v. Fields; Florida v. Powell; Maryland v. Shatzer; Montejo v. Louisiana; Rothgery v. Gillespie County, Texas; Perry v. New Hampshire; and Kansas v. Ventris.

As always, the inclusion of new material has forced some difficult decisions about what might be deleted and trimmed. In this edition, the following main opinions have been transformed into notes: United States v. Mendenhall (converted into two notes in two different Chapter Five subsections); Colorado v. Spring; and Minnick v. Mississippi. I realize that some may disagree with my choices. Instructors who wish to assign and teach the main opinions for these cases are welcome to reproduce the versions that appear in the sixth edition.

There are a few unpredictable, and noteworthy, changes in this edition — unique modifications that, in my view, significantly improve the organization in three of the chapters. The most dramatic is the wholesale reorganization of Chapter Ten — Confessions and the Right to Assistance of Counsel. In prior editions, that chapter has been organized chronologically. In the seventh edition, it has been reordered logically, according to the various components of the Massiah doctrine. The chapter still opens with the foundational decision in Massiah. It then addresses the two elements necessary to give rise to right to counsel protection — the “initiation of adversary proceedings” threshold for attachment of that right and the “deliberate elicitation” by a government agent demand. Finally, the issues surrounding waiver of the right to counsel are explored.

Chapter Eight — The Privilege Against Self-Incrimination and Confessions — has seen more modest reorganization. Subsection D, which in prior editions was concerned solely with waiver of Miranda’s safeguards, now encompasses both of the basic prerequisites for compliance with Miranda — adequate warnings and a knowing and voluntary waiver. The portion of Subsection E addressing invocation of the Miranda right to counsel still begins with the foundational ruling concerning the consequences of a suspect’s request for legal assistance, Edwards v. Arizona, then addresses what constitutes an invocation of the right to counsel. After that, a lengthy textual note considers each of the four post-invocation situations confronted by the Supreme Court:
the initiation of communications by a suspect, a substantial break in custody, consultation with counsel by a suspect, and the initiation of communications by different law enforcement officers about a different offense.

Chapter Fourteen — The Scope of and Exceptions to the Exclusionary Rules — has also undergone some reconstruction. To eliminate confusion and to reflect the uniqueness of the Miranda suppression doctrine, the three Miranda opinions that used to be located within the “attenuation” subsection — Oregon v. Elstad, Missouri v. Seibert, and United States v. Patane — have been extracted and accorded independent status in a subsection entitled “The Miranda Exclusion Doctrine.” This subsection has been placed after both the Fourth Amendment “attenuation” and “good faith” exceptions, but before the “impeachment” exception (which includes both Miranda and Fourth Amendment opinions).

This casebook has always sought to furnish enough material for students to gain a clear understanding of the basic topics without being overwhelmed and confused by unnecessary and distracting details. The cases presented are limited to those decided by the United States Supreme Court. The primary aim remains the same — to facilitate students’ appreciation of the richness and complexity of the issues pertaining to each topic. Moreover, as in prior versions, the seventh edition makes no effort to address every significant question or to present every Supreme Court decision relating to the topics that are covered.

From the start, the aim of this text has not been merely to delineate the current “law” governing the issues addressed. Instructors will still find not only the most recent approaches to the questions but prior approaches that have been supplanted or refined.
Seminal decisions remain because students are enriched by insights into the historical roots and the evolution of the constitutional doctrines. Moreover, these decisions enable students to reach their own conclusions about the appropriate resolutions of important issues.

Welsh and I always preferred to allow the Supreme Court to speak for itself as much as possible. Although most of the opinions have been edited substantially, core analytical elements of the majority opinions have been retained. Moreover, the text presents the conclusions and the basic reasoning of significant concurrences and dissents.

There are two noteworthy features that have always distinguished this text from other * Substantive deletions have been indicated by ellipses. Although citations to cases and other sources have frequently been deleted, there are no indications of those deletions.

criminal procedure casebooks. First, the textual material at the beginnings of chapters and between main opinions has been, and still is, limited — although it has inevitably grown through the years. One belief that Welsh and I shared — a tenet that once again guided my choices — is that detailed scholarly or analytical discussions are better left to treatises, hornbooks, and law review articles. In every edition, our preference has been to include focused questions and brief comments that encourage students to do their own thinking. I once again made my best effort to restrict the Notes and Questions to the most germane issues related to the main opinions. Updated bibliographies of pertinent articles appear at the ends of chapters and/or subsections. Students interested in pursuing more extensive discussions of the subjects dealt with in this text should consult the scholarly pieces listed in these bibliographies.

The second distinctive feature of the text is the inclusion of “problems” at the end of every lengthy section. The problems, which are based on actual federal and state cases, can serve several functions. By highlighting specific facets of the doctrine, some of the problems focus attention upon and reinforce important principles announced in the Court’s decisions. Other problems highlight unresolved or debatable issues generated by those decisions — issues that are the focus of disputes in the lower courts. The problems furnish vehicles for testing and fleshing out students’ awareness and understanding of doctrinal nuances. They afford opportunities to apply governing principles to different fact patterns, thereby refining and exercising exam-taking skills. While a majority of the problems that appeared in the prior edition have been retained, I have tried to “refresh” most of the problem collections with new situations that raise interesting, sometimes novel or cutting-edge, issues.

From the start, the primary objective of this casebook has been to provide a pragmatic and flexible instructional tool. Welsh and I believed that the inclusion of the most significant decisions, the preservation of the critical elements of the Justices’ reasoning, and the incorporation of problem situations would prove useful to a wide range of Criminal Procedure teachers. Instructors who prefer the more traditional, Socratic approach will have the necessary opinion material. Those who emphasize a problem-oriented methodology should find a sufficient number of problems to enable exploration and development of the students’ understanding. Teachers who blend the case and problem approaches should also find the book adaptable to their needs. Any of the classroom approaches facilitated by the text should enable professors and students to gain a comprehensive understanding of the relevant doctrine and to explore the vital policy considerations and value choices that underlie our Constitution and its interpretation.

I wish to express my deep appreciation to three research assistants, Ryan Melcher, Greg Taylor, and Phil Van Liew, and to my administrative assistant, Jackie Hand. Indeed, I would be remiss not to express my gratitude to all research and administrative assistants who have contributed their labors to prior editions of the casebook. This seventh edition stands on the shoulders of its six predecessors.

James J. Tomkovicz
August, 2012
JUSTICES OF THE UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>(1) ^1</th>
<th>(2)</th>
<th>(3)</th>
<th>(4)</th>
<th>(5)</th>
<th>(6)</th>
<th>(7)</th>
<th>(8)</th>
<th>(9)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1983</td>
<td>Burger (1969-86)</td>
<td>Powell (1972-87)</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2003</td>
<td>Roberts (2005-present)</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

---

1. Starting with membership as of 1953
2. Chief Justice
3. Year of Appointment
4. Years on Court
Introduction

This brief Introduction is intended to familiarize students with two foundational subjects: the typical processes of and participants in the American criminal justice system and the constitutional source of restraints upon state law enforcement officers. The excerpt in Part A describes the operation of the criminal justice system. Part B contains a brief history and summary of the regulation of state conduct by Bill of Rights guarantees incorporated through the Due Process Clause.

[A] An Overview of the Criminal Justice System

NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMISSION ON CRIMINAL JUSTICE STANDARDS AND GOALS: COURTS 11-15 (1973)*

Arrest

The first formal contact of an accused with the criminal justice system is likely to be an arrest by a police officer. In most cases, the arrest will be made upon the police officer’s own evaluation that there is sufficient basis for believing that a crime had been committed by the accused. However, the arrest may be made pursuant to a warrant: in this case, the police officer or some other person will have submitted the evidence against the accused to a judicial officer, who determines whether the evidence is sufficient to justify an arrest. In some situations, the accused may have no formal contact with the law until he or she had been indicted by a grand jury. Following such an indictment, a court order may be issued authorizing police officers to take the accused into custody. But these are exceptional situations. Ordinarily, the arrest is made without any court order and the court’s contact with the accused comes only after the arrest.

Even if there has been no court involvement in the initial decision to arrest the defendant, courts may have been involved in the case at an earlier stage. The requirement of the Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution that all searches be reasonable has been interpreted to mean that a warrant be obtained from a judicial officer before all searches unless there are specific reasons for not obtaining a warrant. Thus investigations that precede arrest sometimes involve searches made pursuant to a search warrant issued by a court. The court role in criminal investigation is broadening in other areas, and procedures are being developed whereby suspects may be compelled to submit to photographing, fingerprinting, and similar processes by court order. The potential for court involvement in the criminal justice system, then, extends to early parts of the police investigatory stage.

Initial Judicial Appearance

In all jurisdictions, a police officer or other person making an arrest must bring the arrested person before a judge within a short period of time. It is at this initial appearance that most accused have their first contact with the courts. This initial appearance is usually before a lower court — a justice of the peace or a magistrate. Thus in

* Reprinted with the permission of the United States Department of Justice Office of Justice Programs.
Prosecutions for serious cases the initial appearance (and some further processes) occur in courts that do not have jurisdiction to determine the guilt or innocence of the accused. Often by the time of the initial appearance, the prosecution will have prepared a formal document called a complaint, which charges the defendant with a specific crime.

At the initial appearance, several things may occur. First, the defendant will be informed of the charges against him, usually by means of complaint. Second, the defendant will be informed of his or her rights, including the constitutional privilege against self-incrimination. Third, if the case is one in which the accused will be provided with an attorney at state expense, the mechanical process of assigning the attorney at least may begin at this stage. Fourth, unless the defendant is convicted of an offense at this point, arrangement may be made concerning the release of the defendant before further proceedings. This may take the traditional form of setting bail, that is, establishment of an amount of security the defendant himself or a professional bondsman whom the defendant may hire must deposit with the court (or assume the obligation to pay) to assure that the defendant does appear for later proceedings. Pretrial release, in some jurisdictions, also may take the form of being released on one’s own recognizance, that is, released simply upon the defendant’s promise to appear at a later time. Other forms of encouraging a released defendant’s later appearance sometimes are used.

In addition to these matters collateral to the issue of guilt, it is at the initial appearance that judicial inquiry into the merits of the case begins. If the charge is one the lower court has authority to try, the defendant may be asked how he or she pleads. If the defendant pleads guilty, the defendant may be convicted at this point. If the defendant pleads not guilty, a trial date may be set and trial held later in this court.

However, if the charge is more serious, the court must give the defendant the opportunity for a judicial evaluation to determine whether there is enough evidence to justify putting the defendant on trial in the higher court. In this type of case, the judge at the initial appearance ordinarily will ask the defendant whether he or she wants a preliminary hearing. If the defendant does, the matter generally is continued, or postponed to give both the prosecution and the defense time to prepare their cases.

The matter will be taken up again later in the lower court at the preliminary hearing. At this proceeding, the prosecutor introduces evidence to try to prove the defendant’s guilt. The prosecutor need not convince the court of the defendant’s guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, but need only establish that there is enough evidence from which an average person (juror) could conclude that the defendant was guilty of the crime charged. If this evidence is produced, the court may find that the prosecution has established probable cause to believe the defendant guilty.

At this preliminary hearing the defendant may cross-examine witnesses produced by the prosecution and present evidence himself. If the court finds at the end of the preliminary hearing that probable cause does not exist, it dismisses the complaint. This does not ordinarily prevent the prosecution from bringing another charge, however. If the court finds that probable cause does exist, it orders that the defendant be bound over to the next step in the prosecution. As a practical matter, the preliminary hearing also serves the function of giving the defendant and his attorney a look at the case the prosecution will produce at trial. It gives a defense attorney the opportunity to cross-examine witnesses the attorney later will have to confront. This informal previewing function may be more valuable to defendants than the theoretical function of the preliminary hearing.
Filing of Formal Criminal Charge

Generally, it is following the decision of the lower court to bind over a defendant that the formal criminal charge is made in the court that would try the case if it goes to formal trial. If no grand jury action is to be taken, this is a simple step consisting of the prosecutor’s filing a document called an information. However, in many jurisdictions the involvement of the grand jury makes the process more complex. There, the decision at the preliminary hearing simply is to bind the defendant over for consideration by the grand jury. In these areas, the prosecutor then must go before the grand jury and again present the evidence. Only if the grand jury determines that there is probable cause does it act. Its action — consisting of issuing a document called an indictment — constitutes the formal charging of the defendant. If it does not find probable cause, it takes no action and the prosecution is dismissed.

In some jurisdictions, it is not necessary to have both a grand jury inquiry and a preliminary hearing. In most federal jurisdictions, for example, if a defendant has been indicted by a grand jury the defendant no longer has a right to a preliminary hearing, on the theory that the defendant is entitled to only one determination as to whether probable cause exists.

Although the defendant is entitled to participate in the preliminary hearing, the defendant has no right to take part in a grand jury inquiry. Traditionally, he has not been able to ascertain what went on in front of the grand jury, although increasingly the law has given him the right, after the fact, to know.

Following the formal charge — whether it has been by indictment or information — any of a variety of matters that require resolution may arise. The defendant’s competency to stand trial may be in issue. This requires the court to resolve the question of whether the defendant is too mentally ill or otherwise impaired to participate meaningfully in his trial. If he is sufficiently impaired, trial must be postponed until the defendant regains competency.

The defendant also may challenge the validity of the indictment or information or the means by which they were issued. For example, the defendant may assert that those acts with which he or she is charged do not constitute a crime under the laws of jurisdiction. Or, if the defendant was indicted by a grand jury, the defendant may assert that the grand jury was selected in a manner not consistent with state or federal law and, therefore, that the indictment is invalid.

A defendant also may — and in some jurisdictions must — raise, before trial, challenges to the admissibility of certain evidence, especially evidence seized by police officers in a search or statements obtained from the defendant by interrogation. In view of the rapid growth of legal doctrine governing the admissibility of statements of defendants and evidence obtained by police search and seizure, resolution of the issues raised by defendants’ challenges to the admissibility of such evidence may be more complex and time-consuming than anything involved in determining guilt or innocence.

The criminal law also is increasingly abandoning the traditional approach that neither side is entitled to know what evidence the other side is going to produce until the other side actually presents it at trial. In the main, this has take the form of granting defendants greater access to such things as physical evidence (e.g., fingerprints) that will be used against them. Access to witness[es’] statements sometimes is required, and some jurisdictions are compelling the defendant to grant limited disclosure to the prosecution.
Introduction

Arraignment

In view of the potential complexity of pretrial matters, much of the significant activity in a criminal prosecution already may have occurred at the time the defendant makes his or her first formal appearance before the court that is to try him or her. This first appearance — the arraignment — is the point at which the defendant is asked to plead to the charge. The defendant need not plead, in which case a plea of not guilty automatically is entered for the defendant. If the defendant pleads guilty, the law requires that certain precautions be taken to assure that this plea is made validly. Generally, the trial judge accepting the plea first must inquire of the defendant whether the defendant understands the charge against him or her and the penalties that may be imposed. The judge also must be assured that there is some reasonable basis in the facts of the case for the plea. This may involve requiring the prosecution to present some of its evidence to assure the court that there is evidence tending to establish guilt.

Trial

Unless the defendant enters a guilty plea, the full adversary process is put into motion. The prosecution now must establish to a jury or a judge the guilt of the defendant beyond a reasonable doubt. If the defendant elects to have the case tried by a jury, much effort is expended on the selection of a jury. Prospective jurors are questioned to ascertain whether they might be biased and what their views on numerous matters might be. Both sides have the right to have a potential juror rejected on the ground that the juror may be biased. In addition, both have the right to reject a limited number of potential jurors without having to state any reason. When the jury has been selected and convened, both sides may make opening statements explaining what they intend to prove or disprove.

The prosecution presents its evidence first, and the defendant has the option of making no case and relying upon the prosecution’s inability to establish guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. The defendant also has the option of presenting evidence tending to disprove the prosecution’s case or tending to prove additional facts constituting a defense under applicable law. Throughout, however, the burden remains upon the prosecution. Procedurally, this is effectuated by defense motions to dismiss, which often are made after the prosecution’s case has been presented and after all of the evidence is in. These motions in effect assert that the prosecution’s case is so weak that no reasonable jury could conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant was guilty. If the judge grants the motion, the judge is, in effect, determining that no jury could reasonably return a verdict of guilty. This not only results in a dismissal of the prosecution but also prevents the prosecution from bringing another charge for the same crime.

After the evidence is in and defense motions are disposed of, the jury is instructed on the applicable law. Often both defense and prosecution lawyers submit instructions which they ask the court to read to the jury, and the court chooses from those and others it composes itself. It is in the formulation of these instructions that many issues regarding the definition of the applicable law arise and must be resolved. After — or sometimes before — the instructions are read, both sides present formal arguments to the jury. The jury then retires for its deliberations.

Generally, the jury may return only one of two verdicts: guilty or not guilty. A verdict of not guilty may be misleading; it may mean not that the jury believed that the defendant was not guilty but rather that the jury determined that the prosecution had not established guilt by the criterion — beyond a reasonable doubt — the law imposes. If the insanity defense has been raised, the jury may be told it should specify if insanity is the reason for acquittal; otherwise, there is no need for explanation. If a guilty verdict is returned, the court formally enters a judgment of conviction unless there is a legally sufficient reason for not doing so.

The defendant may attack the conviction, usually by making a motion to set aside the verdict and order a new trial. In the attack, the defendant may argue that evidence was improperly admitted during the trial, that the evidence was so weak that no reasonable jury could have found that it established guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, or that there is newly discovered evidence which, had it been available at the time of trial, would have changed the result. If the court grants a motion raising one of these arguments, the effect generally is not to acquit the defendant but merely to require the holding of a new trial.

Sentencing

Sentencing then follows. (If the court has accepted a plea of guilty, this step follows acceptance of the plea.) In an increasing number of jurisdictions, an investigation called the presentence report is conducted by professional probation officers. This involves investigation of the offense, the offender and the offender's background, and any other matters of potential value to the sentencing judge. Following submission of the report to the court, the defendant is given the opportunity to comment upon the appropriateness of sentencing. In some jurisdictions, this has developed into a more extensive court hearing on sentencing issues, with the defendant given the opportunity to present evidence as well as argument for leniency. Sentencing itself generally is the responsibility of the judge, although in some jurisdictions juries retain that authority.

Appeal

Following the conclusion of the proceeding in the trial court, the matter shifts to the appellate courts. In some jurisdictions, a defendant who is convicted of a minor offense in a lower court has the right to a new trial (trial de novo) in a higher court. However, in most situations — and in all cases involving serious offenses — the right to appeal is limited to the right to have an appellate court examine the record of the trial proceedings for error. If error is found, the appellate court either may take definitive action — such as ordering that the prosecution be dismissed — or it may set aside the conviction and remand the case for a new trial. The latter gives the prosecution the opportunity to obtain a valid conviction. Generally, a time limit is placed upon the period during which an appeal may be taken.

Collateral Attack

Even if no appeal is taken or the conviction is upheld, the court’s participation in the criminal justice process is not necessarily ended. To some extent, a convicted defendant who has either exhausted all appeal rights or declined to exercise them within the appropriate time limits can seek further relief by means of collateral attack upon the conviction. This method involves a procedure collateral to the standard process of conviction and appeal.

Traditionally, this relief was sought by applying for a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that the conviction under which the applicant was held was invalid. Many jurisdictions have found this vehicle too cumbersome for modern problems and have developed special procedure for collateral attacks. Despite variations in terminology and procedural technicalities, however, opportunities remain for an accused convicted in federal court to seek such collateral relief from his conviction in federal courts and for those convicted in state courts to seek similar relief in state and, to a somewhat more limited extent, in federal courts.

Introduction

The matter has become an increasingly significant point of the state-federal friction as issues of federal constitutional law have become more important parts of criminal litigation. Defendants convicted in state courts apparently have thought that federal courts offered a more sympathetic forum for assertions that federal constitutional rights were violated during a state criminal prosecution. State judges and prosecutors have indicated resentment of the actions of federal courts in reversing state convictions for reasons state courts either considered of no legal merit or refused to consider for what they felt were valid reasons.

In any case, because the collateral attack upon a conviction remains available until (and even after) the defendant has gone through the correctional process, the courts’ role in the criminal justice process extends from the earliest points of criminal investigation to the final portions of the correctional process.

[B] Due Process and Incorporation of the Bill of Rights

There can be no question that the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Amendment guarantees treated in this casebook were intended to govern the actions of federal law enforcement officers. With respect to state law enforcement officers, an important preliminary question is whether the guarantees of the Bill of Rights regulate state action. Early on, in Barron v. Baltimore, 32 U.S. (7 Pet.) 243, 8 L. Ed. 672 (1833), the United States Supreme Court answered that question, holding that the Bill of Rights governs only the federal government and not the states. That holding endures today. Nevertheless, due to the Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clause, a provision specifically designed to control state action, today the states are generally not free to do that which the Bill of Rights proscribes.

For many years, the members of the Supreme Court debated the extent to which the liberties reflected in various Bill of Rights provisions are a part of the “due process of law” that the Fourteenth Amendment prohibits states from denying. Initially, the prevailing view was that the Due Process Clause required only those rights and procedures that were “implicit in the concept of ordered liberty.” Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319, 58 S. Ct. 149, 82 L. Ed. 2d 288 (1937); see also Adamson v. California, 332 U.S. 46, 677 S. Ct. 1672, 91 L. Ed. 2d 1903 (1947). This “ordered liberty” approach to interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment yielded a number of holdings that permitted states to afford fewer rights and liberties than provided for in the Bill of Rights.

Over the years, however, a different approach to the issue evolved. In Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S 145, 88 S. Ct. 1444, 20 L. Ed. 2d 491 (1968), the Court, in an opinion by Justice White, endorsed and explained that approach. The Court explained that a provision of the Bill of Rights is applicable to the states as an integral part of due process if it is “essential to an Anglo-American regime of ordered liberty” or “fundamental to the American scheme of justice.” Moreover, in determining whether a particular provision qualifies, the Court will not consider the provision in the abstract, but, rather, will evaluate it against the backdrop of the common-law system of criminal procedure that has developed “contemporaneously in England and in this country.” Thus, in deciding that the right to jury trial is applicable to the states, the Duncan Court emphasized the historical role of the jury in England and in this country, noting that for centuries the jury had served as a buffer between the individual and the government.

That approach to deciding whether the substance of a particular Bill of Rights entitlement applies to the states has been called “selective incorporation.”1 While the approach has been “selective” in demanding individual evaluation of each provision, over time it has resulted in the effective “incorporation” of most of the Bill of Rights guarantees.2 Moreover, the Court has generally refused to dilute those guarantees, but, instead, has found that the content of the Due Process Clause is identical to the content of specific Bill of Rights provisions.

For purposes of the subjects in this casebook, students need to appreciate two basic matters. First, the actual constitutional source of the controls on state law enforcement is the Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clause. Second, the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Amendment regulations on law enforcement activity considered in this book have been fully and exactly “incorporated” and applied to the states through that Due Process Clause.

1 For a discussion of the approach, see Israel, Selective Incorporation Revisited, 71 GEO. L.J. 253 (1982).

2 Only two provisions pertinent to criminal contexts have not been incorporated. The Fifth Amendment requirement of a grand jury indictment for “capital or otherwise infamous” crimes has been found inapplicable to the states, and the incorporation of the Eighth Amendment guarantee against “excessive bail” is still an unresolved issue.
Introduction

A general view of The Criminal Justice System

This chart seeks to present a simple yet comprehensive view of the movement of cases through the criminal justice system. Procedures in individual jurisdictions may vary from the pattern shown here. The differing widths of line indicate the relative volumes of cases disposed of at various points in the system, but this is only suggestive since no nationwide data of this sort exists.

1 May continue until trial.
2 Administrative record of arrest. First entry at which temporary release or bail may be available.
3 Before magistrate, commissioner, or justice of peace. Formal notice of charge, aside of either bail. Bail set. Summary trial for petty offenses usually conducted here without further processing.
4 Preliminary hearing or evidence against defendant. Change may be reduced, no separate preliminary hearing for misdemeanors in some systems.
5 Change filed by prosecutor on basis of information submitted by police or citizens. Alternative to grand jury indictment; often used in homicide, almost always in misdemeanors.
6 Requires whether Government evidence sufficient to satisfy the grand jury system; otherwise admissible in it.
Introduction
Table of Contents

Dedication .................................................. iii
Preface .................................................... v
Introduction .............................................. ix

PART I SEARCHES AND SEIZURES ......................... 1

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Chapter 1</th>
<th>THE “THRESHOLD” OF THE FOURTH AMENDMENT RIGHT TO BE SECURE AGAINST SEARCHES</th>
<th>3</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Katz v. United States</td>
<td>❄️</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Notes and Questions</td>
<td></td>
<td>10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>United States v. White</td>
<td></td>
<td>10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Notes and Questions</td>
<td></td>
<td>16</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Smith v. Maryland</td>
<td></td>
<td>17</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Notes and Questions</td>
<td></td>
<td>24</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>California v. Ciraolo</td>
<td></td>
<td>24</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Notes and Questions</td>
<td></td>
<td>30</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bond v. United States</td>
<td></td>
<td>34</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Notes and Questions</td>
<td></td>
<td>37</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kyllo v. United States</td>
<td></td>
<td>38</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Notes and Questions</td>
<td></td>
<td>48</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Chapter 2</th>
<th>UNREASONABLENESS AND THE PROBABLE CAUSE REQUIREMENT</th>
<th>59</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Spinelli v. United States</td>
<td>❄️</td>
<td>62</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Notes and Questions</td>
<td></td>
<td>71</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Illinois v. Gates</td>
<td></td>
<td>71</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Notes and Questions</td>
<td></td>
<td>86</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Whren v. United States</td>
<td></td>
<td>87</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Notes and Questions</td>
<td></td>
<td>92</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>“Probable Cause Problems”</td>
<td></td>
<td>94</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Chapter 3</th>
<th>UNREASONABLENESS AND THE WARRANT REQUIREMENT</th>
<th>105</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>[A]</td>
<td>The Warrant Requirement and Searches of Persons, Houses, Papers, and Effects</td>
<td>106</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Johnson v. United States</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Notes and Questions</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>United States v. Watson</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Notes and Questions</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Atwater v. City of Lago Vista</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Notes and Questions</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>[C]</td>
<td>The Issuance, Content, and Execution of Warrants</td>
<td>136</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>United States v. Grubbs</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Table of Contents

Notes and Questions .................................................. 140
Andresen v. Maryland .................................................. 141
Notes and Questions .................................................. 145
Wilson v. Arkansas .................................................. 149
Notes and Questions .................................................. 153
Warrant Problems ...................................................... 158

Chapter 4
REASONABLE SEARCHES WITHOUT WARRANTS: THE NATURE AND SCOPE OF THE EXCEPTIONS TO THE WARRANT REQUIREMENT
[169]

[A] Searches Incident to Arrests and Searches for Arrestees .................. 170
Chimel v. California .................................................. 170
Notes and Questions .................................................. 178
United States v. Robinson ............................................ 179
Notes and Questions .................................................. 189
New York v. Belton ................................................... 191
Notes and Questions .................................................. 196
Arizona v. Gant ....................................................... 197
Notes and Questions .................................................. 210
Payton v. New York ................................................... 210
Steagald v. United States ............................................... 220
Notes and Questions .................................................. 225
Arrestee Search Problems .............................................. 226

[B] Exigent Circumstances Searches .................................... 234
Warden, Maryland Penitentiary v. Hayden ............................ 234
Notes and Questions .................................................. 235
Vale v. Louisiana ...................................................... 238
Notes and Questions .................................................. 241
Exigent Circumstances Problems ....................................... 245

[C] Vehicle and Container Searches ..................................... 253
Chambers v. Maroney .................................................. 253
Notes and Questions .................................................. 257
California v. Carney .................................................. 259
Notes and Questions .................................................. 263
United States v. Chadwick ............................................ 265
Notes and Questions .................................................. 273
California v. Acevedo .................................................. 274
Notes and Questions .................................................. 284
Vehicle And Container Problems ....................................... 286

[D] Inventory Searches .................................................. 293
South Dakota v. Opperman .......................................... 293
Notes and Questions .................................................. 301
Illinois v. Lafayette ................................................... 301
Notes and Questions .................................................. 304
Colorado v. Bertine .................................................... 305
Notes and Questions .................................................. 309
Inventory Search Problems ............................................ 310

[E] Consent Searches .................................................... 317

Chapter 5

THE BALANCING APPROACH TO FOURTH AMENDMENT REASONABLENESS

[A] Stops, Frisks, and the Right to Be Secure in One's Person, House, and Effects

[1] The Constitutional Doctrine and Its Theoretical Underpinnings
  - Terry v. Ohio
  - Notes and Questions
  - Dunaway v. New York
  - Notes and Questions

[2] "Seizures" of Persons
  - Notes on United States v. Mendenhall
  - Florida v. Bostick
  - Notes and Questions
  - California v. Hodari D.
  - Notes and Questions
  - Problems

[3] The Showing Needed to "Stop" and "Frisk"
  - Illinois v. Wardlow
  - Notes and Questions
  - Alabama v. White
  - Florida v. J.L.
  - Notes and Questions
  - Problems

  - Hayes v. Florida
  - Notes and Questions
  - United States v. Sharpe
  - Notes and Questions
  - United States v. Place
  - Notes and Questions
  - Michigan v. Long
  - Notes and Questions
Table of Contents

- Minnesota v. Dickerson .................................................. 482
- Notes and Questions ......................................................... 488
- Maryland v. Bue .............................................................. 488
- Notes and Questions ......................................................... 494
- Problems ................................................................. 494

[B] Special Balancing Contexts ................................................. 505

[1] School Searches .............................................................. 505
- New Jersey v. T.L.O. ......................................................... 505
- Notes and Questions ......................................................... 519

[2] Checkpoints ................................................................. 520
- Michigan Department of State Police v. Sitz ......................... 520
- Notes and Questions ......................................................... 527
- City of Indianapolis v. Edmond ........................................... 528
- Notes and Questions ......................................................... 538
- Illinois v. Lidster .......................................................... 538
- Notes and Questions ......................................................... 542

- Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives’ Association ................. 543
- Notes and Questions ......................................................... 557
- Chandler v. Miller ........................................................ 560
- Notes and Questions ......................................................... 566

[4] Border Searches ............................................................. 568
- United States v. Flores-Montano ........................................ 568
- Notes and Questions ......................................................... 571
- Problems ................................................................. 571

[C] Higher Than Usual Standards of Reasonableness ....................... 581
- Tennessee v. Garner ........................................................ 581
- Notes and Questions ......................................................... 589
- Schmerber v. California .................................................. 592
- Winston v. Lee ............................................................ 594
- Notes and Questions ......................................................... 598
- Problems ................................................................. 599

PART II ENTRAPMENT ......................................................... 607

Chapter 6 ENTRAPMENT AND RELATED DEFENSES .......... 609

- Sherman v. United States .................................................. 610
- Notes and Questions ......................................................... 616
- United States v. Russell .................................................. 617
- Hampton v. United States ................................................ 625
- Notes and Questions ......................................................... 630
- Jacobson v. United States ................................................ 630
- Notes and Questions ......................................................... 639
- Entrapment and Due Process Problems ................................ 640
Table of Contents

PART III CONFESSIONS ..................................... 649

Chapter 7 DUE PROCESS OF LAW AND CONFESSIONS ........ 651

- Introductory Note ........................................... 652
- Ashcraft v. Tennessee ...................................... 652
- Notes and Questions ....................................... 662
- Spano v. New York ......................................... 663
- Notes and Questions ....................................... 669
- Colorado v. Connelly ...................................... 670
- Notes and Questions ....................................... 676
- Involuntary Confession Problems ......................... 677

Chapter 8 THE PRIVILEGE AGAINST SELF-INCrimINATION AND CONFESSIONS ........ 687

- [A] The Constitutional Basis ................................. 688
  - Miranda v. Arizona ...................................... 688
  - Notes and Questions .................................... 704
  - New York v. Quarles ................................... 705
  - Notes and Questions .................................... 714
  - Dickerson v. United States ......................... 715
  - Notes and Questions .................................... 727
  - Problems .................................................. 728
- [B] Custody .................................................... 731
  - Berkemer v. McCarty ................................... 731
  - Notes and Questions .................................... 737
  - J. D. B. v. North Carolina ......................... 738
  - Notes and Questions .................................... 751
  - Problems .................................................. 753
- [C] Interrogation ............................................. 760
  - Rhode Island v. Innis ................................... 760
  - Notes and Questions .................................... 770
  - Illinois v. Perkins ...................................... 770
  - Notes and Questions .................................... 777
  - Problems .................................................. 778
- [D] Warnings and Waiver ................................... 783
  - Notes on the Warnings Requirement .................... 783
  - Berghuis v. Thompkins ................................ 785
  - Notes and Questions .................................... 794
  - Problems .................................................. 796
- [E] Invocation of Protections ............................... 801
  - Michigan v. Mosley .................................... 801
  - Notes and Questions .................................... 809
  - Edwards v. Arizona .................................... 809
  - Notes and Questions .................................... 816
  - Davis v. United States ................................ 816
Table of Contents

Kirby v. Illinois .......................................................... 940

United States v. Ash ...................................................... 946

Notes and Questions .................................................... 956

Problems ................................................................. 958

Chapter 12 THE DUE PROCESS CLAUSE AND IDENTIFICATIONS ................. 963

Introductory Note .......................................................... 963

Stovall v. Denno ........................................................... 963

Notes and Questions ...................................................... 965

Manson v. Brathwaite ..................................................... 967

Notes and Questions ...................................................... 980

Problems ................................................................. 983

PART V EXCLUSIONARY RULES .............................................. 993

Chapter 13 THE SOURCES OF AND RATIONALES FOR THE EXCLUSIONARY RULES ......................................................... 995

Introductory Note .......................................................... 996

Weeks v. United States .................................................... 996

Mapp v. Ohio ............................................................... 999

Notes and Questions ...................................................... 1009

Chapter 14 THE SCOPE OF AND EXCEPTIONS TO THE EXCLUSIONARY RULES ................................................................. 1017

[A] The “Standing” Limitation .............................................. 1018

Note on Alderman v. United States .................................... 1018

Rakas v. Illinois ............................................................. 1019

Notes and Questions ...................................................... 1032

Minnesota v. Carter ......................................................... 1035

Notes and Questions ...................................................... 1044

“Standing” Problems ...................................................... 1045

[B] The “Independent Source” and “Inevitable Discovery” Doctrines ........ 1051

Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States .............................. 1051

Murray v. United States .................................................... 1052

Notes and Questions ...................................................... 1059

Nix v. Williams .............................................................. 1059

Notes and Questions ...................................................... 1067

Independent Source and Inevitable Discovery Problems .......... 1068

[C] The “Attenuation” Doctrine ............................................ 1075

Wong Sun v. United States ................................................ 1075

Brown v. Illinois ............................................................ 1079

Notes and Questions ...................................................... 1089

Hudson v. Michigan ........................................................ 1091

xxv
Table of Contents

Notes and Questions ................................................. 1107
“Attenuation” Problems ............................................. 1108

[D] The “Good Faith” Exception .................................... 1113
United States v. Leon ................................................. 1113
Massachusetts v. Sheppard ......................................... 1133
Notes and Questions .................................................. 1136
Herring v. United States ............................................. 1137
Notes and Questions .................................................. 1148
“Good Faith” Problems .............................................. 1149

[E] The Miranda Exclusion Doctrine ............................... 1157
Oregon v. Elstad ....................................................... 1157
Notes and Questions .................................................. 1170
Missouri v. Seibert ..................................................... 1171
Notes and Questions .................................................. 1182
United States v. Patane ................................................. 1182
Notes and Questions .................................................. 1188
Miranda Exclusion Problems ....................................... 1189

[F] The “Impeachment” Limitation ................................. 1194
Harris v. New York ..................................................... 1194
United States v. Havens .............................................. 1197
James v. Illinois ....................................................... 1204
Notes and Questions .................................................. 1212
Impeachment Problems .............................................. 1213

Appendix A  THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA ................................................................. 1223

TABLE OF CASES .......................................................... TC-1

INDEX ................................................................. I-1