Preface

Substantive criminal law has traditionally been a very important part of the first-year curriculum. The course introduces the student to the criminal justice system, raises the question of why and how we punish, and enables instructors to discuss with students the thorny problem of the relationship between the state and the individual. In preparing the latest edition of these materials, we have once again attempted to produce a casebook of reasonable length which can be completely covered in a one semester course. Problems have been developed to demonstrate the difficulties discussed above and many modern issues have been emphasized to stimulate student interest in the course.

Many fine people assisted us in the preparation of the various editions of these classroom materials, from Catholic University, the College of William and Mary, and the University of Mississippi. We thank them all for their wonderful assistance.
