*To Sandra Westervelt, an incredible teacher, scholar, mentor, and friend, who sparked my interest in wrongful convictions more than a decade ago.
And to Kirk Bloodsworth, who cemented my desire to be an ally in the fight for justice. May this work and these stories do the same for others.*

Acknowledgments

We first wish to thank the good folks at Carolina Academic Press, who have been a pleasure to work with. Beth Hall has shepherded us through the process from the outset with enthusiasm and unwavering support. We also gratefully acknowledge the careful and thorough assistance provided by TJ Smithers in helping prepare our manuscript for publication. Any remaining errors, of course, are ours alone.

We also are thankful to our many colleagues in wrongful conviction scholarship and teaching, whose work has inspired this book and made it possible.

We are particularly indebted to Andrew Madrigal and Clayton Drummond, whose research assistance helped greatly in getting this manuscript across the finish line.

Finally, we must acknowledge those whose stories are covered in this volume and the thousands of others like them. Individuals who experience wrongful conviction and the many others affected by errors in the criminal legal system withstand harm that is difficult to capture in words. Yet they manage to survive and endure with grace and humility. We hope this book will help educate students, scholars, practitioners, advocates, and the public and be a small contribution toward reducing further injustices. And to those who advocate on behalf of the wrongly convicted and are in the trenches fighting to ensure our system is one of justice, we continue to admire your work and hope this volume will help accelerate needed reforms.
