

2021 Supplement to American Constitutional Law and
History (2d ed.)

Michael Ariens

Carolina Academic Press

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Biographies of Selected Justices of the Supreme Court
Gorsuch, Neil	1
Kavanaugh, Brett	1
Coney Barrett, Amy	2
Chapter One
D. The Limits of the Judicial Power
1. Justiciability
a. Standing
Town of Chester v. Laroe Estates, Inc.	3
Trump v. Hawaii	3
June Medical Servs. v. Russo	3
California v. Texas	4
b. Political Question Doctrine
Rucho v. Common Cause	6
E. The Work of the Supreme Court	7
Chapter Two
C. Immunity from Federal Regulation
Murphy v. NCAA	8
Chapter Three
B. Presidential Power
Lucia v. SEC	9
Seila Law LLC v. Consumer Financial Protection Bd.	9
Collins v. Yellen	11
C. Presidential Immunities
Trump v. Vance	13
Trump v. Mazars USA, LLP	13
D. Congress's Power
2. Non-Delegation Doctrine
Gundy v. United States	15
Chapter Four
B. Dormant Commerce Clause
2. Dormant Commerce Clause Theory and Test
b. Facially Neutral Statutes That May Discriminate
South Dakota v. Wayfair	16
Tennessee Wine and Spirits Retailers Ass'n v. Thomas	16

Chapter Five

B. Incorporation
3. Successful Incorporation
Ramos v. Louisiana	18
D. Modern Definitions of “State” Action
1. The Public Function Doctrine
Manhattan Comm. Access Corp. v. Halleck	19

Chapter Six

A. Introduction
Beckles v. United States	20
Nelson v. Colorado	20
B. Procedural Due Process
United States v. Davis	21
C. Substantive Due Process
5. The Re-Emergence of Substantive Due Process
a. Due Process Liberty and Abortion
June Medical Servs. v. Russo	22
D. Takings Clause
1. Is the Property “Taken”?
Murr v. Wisconsin	24
Knick v. Township of Scott	24
Cedar Point Nursery v. Hassid	25

Chapter Seven

E. Gender Discrimination
Sessions v. Morales-Santana	26

Chapter Eight

A. Introduction
4. Where May Speakers Speak?
Packingham v. North Carolina	27
Matal v. Tam	27
Iancu v. Brunetti	28
Minnesota Voters Alliance v. Mansky	28
National Institute of Family and Life Advocates v. Becerra	29
B. Content-Based Regulations of Speech
7. Conduct That Communicates
a. The Test of Symbolic Speech
Expressions Hair Design v. Schneiderman	30
E. Freedom of Association
3. Compelled Association
Janus v. AFSCME	31
American for Prosperity Found. v. Bonta	41

Chapter Nine

B. The Nonestablishment Clause

Trump v. Hawaii43

American Legion v. American Humanist Assn.43

C. The Free Exercise Clause

Our Lady of Guadalupe School v. Morrissey-Berru.....45

Trinity Lutheran Church of Columbia v. Comer45

Masterpiece Cakeshop, Ltd. v. Colorado Civil Rights Comm’n.....58

Espinoza v. Montana Dep’t of Revenue.....60

Fulton v. City of Philadelphia.....62

Chart 9-265

Insert at page lxix:

NEIL GORSUCH (1967-) — Neil Gorsuch was born in Colorado, and raised there and in the Washington, D.C. area. He graduated from Columbia University and Harvard Law School. After law school, Gorsuch clerked for Justice Anthony Kennedy in 1992-93 and for retired Justice Byron White the following year. Gorsuch remained in Washington in the private practice of law, and later served in the Department of Justice. In 2004, he earned a doctorate in law and philosophy from Oxford University. In 2006, President George W. Bush nominated Gorsuch to serve as a judge in the United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit. He remained on the Tenth Circuit until his confirmation to the position of Associate Justice of the Supreme Court in April 2017.

Jurisprudentially, Gorsuch is a textualist, one who seeks to interpret the text of the Constitution through the meaning of the words used at the time of its framing. Although also described as a political conservative, Gorsuch has written opinions as a member of the Court that diverge from the view that the justices fit neatly into the political categories of conservative and liberal. This political lens, generally known as the behavioralist model, can be helpful in some respects but fails in others. Gorsuch's early opinions may be perceived as politically conservative, but a significant number of his opinions do not fit neatly into that box. Gorsuch's understanding of his fidelity to constitutional textualism often serves as a more informative guide to understanding his jurisprudence.

Gorsuch was nominated after the death of Justice Antonin Scalia in February 2016. President Barack Obama nominated Merrick Garland to replace Justice Scalia, but the Republican Senate majority refused to hold hearings on Garland's nomination until after the 2016 presidential election.

Insert at page lxxiv:

BRETT KAVANAUGH (1965-) — Brett Kavanaugh was born and raised in the Washington, D.C. area. He is the only child of Edward and Martha Kavanaugh. His father worked as a lobbyist, and his mother served a public school teacher, and later, worked as a prosecutor and judge in Maryland. Kavanaugh graduated from Yale University in 1987 and Yale Law School in 1990. Kavanaugh clerked for two federal appellate court judges, worked in the Solicitor General's office for a year and then clerked for Justice Anthony Kennedy.

After his Supreme Court clerkship, Kavanaugh was a lawyer in the office of the independent counsel investigating President Bill Clinton, led by Kenneth Starr. Kavanaugh then worked in the private practice of law. During the disputed presidential election of 2000, Kavanaugh worked as part of the legal team for George W. Bush. After the Court's decision in Bush v. Gore (2001) and Bush's inauguration, Kavanaugh served in the Bush White House in several capacities. He was confirmed by the Senate after his third nomination by President Bush to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit.

Kavanaugh was nominated to the Supreme Court by President Donald Trump in July 2018 to replace the retiring Justice Kennedy. Because Kennedy was widely considered the “swing” justice, Kavanaugh’s nomination was strongly opposed by most Democratic senators, who believed he would make the Court a more politically conservative body. Even so, it initially appeared Kavanaugh would be routinely, if contentiously, confirmed by the Republican Senate majority. This changed when a private letter, sent to Senator Dianne Feinstein (D.–Calif.), claimed that Kavanaugh, when a high school student, had sexually assaulted a female teenager at a party. Once the letter was leaked (Feinstein denied doing so), Kavanaugh’s nomination was vociferously attacked. The Senate Judiciary Committee eventually held a hearing on this charge in late September. The two witnesses who testified were Dr. Christine Blasey Ford, who wrote the letter alleging Kavanaugh assaulted her, and Kavanaugh, who denied any assault. As expected, both were certain of their memories.

By a vote of 51-49, the Senate voted to move the nomination to a final vote. Only one Democrat voted yes, and only one Republican voted no. The vote to confirm Kavanaugh the following day, October 6, was 50-48 in favor. (Two Senators with opposing views “paired” their votes so one could miss the confirmation vote and attend his daughter’s wedding.) Kavanaugh was sworn into office that day.

Insert at p. lxiii:

AMY CONEY BARRETT (1972-) — Amy Coney Barrett was born and raised in the New Orleans, Louisiana area. She attended Notre Dame University for college and law school. She graduated first in her law school class (Class of 1997), and served as a judicial clerk in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit and in the Supreme Court (as a clerk for Justice Antonin Scalia) in her first two years out of law school. She then worked for several years in a small, well-known law firm in the District of Columbia. After a stint as a visiting associate professor at George Washington University Law School, her alma mater hired her in 2002. She had spent about fifteen years at Notre Dame Law School when she was nominated to the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit in mid-2017.

The death of Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg in mid-September 2020 created both an open seat and much controversy about filling that seat during a presidential election campaign. President Donald Trump nominated Coney Barrett eight days after Ginsburg’s death. The Senate confirmed Coney Barrett on October 26 in a strictly partisan vote, 52-48.

Barrett is generally viewed as a constitutional “originalist.” Her initial Term on the Court suggests this is an incomplete understanding of her jurisprudence. She has demonstrated some interest in protecting the institution of the Court, unlike Justice Gorsuch, and voted most often with the institutionalist “wing” of the Court, Justice Kavanaugh and Chief Justice Roberts.

Coney Barrett married Jesse Barrett, also a Notre Dame Law School graduate, in 1999. They are the parents of seven children. She is a practicing Roman Catholic.

Insert in Chapter 1 § D.1.a. at page 64:

TOWN OF CHESTER V. LAROE ESTATES, INC., 581 U.S. ___, 137 S. Ct. 1645 (2017) — A unanimous Court, in an opinion by Justice Alito, held that an intervenor in a federal civil action, even when intervening as a matter of right under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, must meet Article III standing requirements. In particular, when an intervenor requests relief in addition to that sought by a party having standing, the Constitution requires the intervenor to prove he has constitutional standing.

TRUMP V. HAWAII, 585 U.S. ___, 138 S. Ct. 2392 (2018) — Plaintiffs challenged the President’s Proclamation restricting the admission to the United States of citizens of a small subset of countries. Most banned from entry were Muslim, or at least were citizens of nations in which a majority of the population was Muslim. One of plaintiffs’ claims was that the Proclamation was intended to exclude Muslims from entry into the United States in violation of the Nonestablishment Clause (see the discussion below in Chapter 9 § B). To reach that constitutional question required the Court to determine whether the plaintiffs enjoyed constitutional standing. It held the plaintiffs possessed a concrete injury: The Proclamation kept the plaintiffs “separated from certain relatives who seek to enter the country.” The Court left for another day a separate claim of constitutional injury made by the plaintiffs. They argued the Proclamation disfavored Islam and injured them in two respects: 1) they claimed an injury based on their right to be free of a federal establishment of religion; and 2) they claimed the Proclamation generated a dignitary and spiritual harm.

JUNE MEDICAL SERVS. V. RUSSO, 591 U.S. ___, 140 S. Ct. 2103 (2020) — Shortly before a Louisiana law requiring physicians who performed abortions to have “active admitting privileges” to a nearby hospital went into effect, “three abortion clinics and two abortion providers” sued, claiming the law was unconstitutional in part because “it imposed an undue burden on the right of their patients to obtain an abortion.” A plurality held that Louisiana had waived the argument that the petitioner-plaintiffs lacked standing to pursue this claim. The plurality stated that the general rule prohibiting third-party standing was “prudential,” not a constitutional requirement. Louisiana had waived the standing claim to obtain a quick decision from the district court, which barred the Court’s consideration of the issue. Even so, the plurality in dicta strongly suggested that in abortion cases such as these, allowing third party standing was proper to effectuate the constitutional rights of the clients of the clinics. Chief Justice Roberts, who concurred in the judgment of the plurality, ignored the standing issue.

In dissent, Justice Thomas concluded this was a case in which constitutional standing was lacking. It was not one merely of prudential standing. Thus, even if Louisiana waived standing, a proposition with which he disagreed, waiver is irrelevant to the requirement that a party possess constitutional standing. In this instance, the clinics “assert no private rights of their own.” Instead, they claimed to represent the constitutional interests of their future clients. The view that third-party standing was not a constitutional issue was wrong because it was inconsistent with recent standing decisions of the Court and because third-party standing was unsupported by a “coherent explanation” why it was best characterized as a prudential rule. Not only was the history of the Court’s explication of prudential standing thin, the Court had recently “questioned the validity of our prudential standing doctrine more generally.” Further, Justice Thomas concluded that the history of the case or controversy requirement of Article III “confirms” the assertion that the “rule against third-party standing is constitutional, not prudential.”

Justice Alito also dissented, joined by Justice Gorsuch and in part by Justices Thomas and Kavanaugh. Justice Alito concluded no waiver of the third-party standing issue had been made by the state. He also concluded “[t]his case features a blatant conflict of interest between an abortion provider and its patients.” That was because the former had a financial incentive to avoid state regulatory requirements and the latter “have an interest in the preservation of regulations that protect their health.” In addition to a conflict of interest, the standards for allowing third-party standing, “(1) closeness to the third party and (2) a hindrance to the third party’s ability to bring suit,” were not met in this case. Justice Gorsuch’s dissent also noted the inapplicability of the facts to the requirements to claim third-party standing and rejected the plurality’s waiver conclusion.

CALIFORNIA V. TEXAS, 593 U.S. ___, 141 S. Ct. 2104 (2021) — After Congress repealed the monetary penalty for those persons who failed to obtain minimum health care insurance, Texas and other states, as well as two individuals, sued alleging the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act was unconstitutional. The Court, in an opinion by Justice Breyer, held neither the individual plaintiffs nor the states enjoyed constitutional standing. The Court’s 7-2 opinion concluded the two individuals lacked constitutional standing because, even if they suffered a particularized harm, they failed to demonstrate the injury be traceable to the government’s conduct. The IRS and the Secretary of Health and Human Services were incapable of seeking a penalty for the failure of a person to obtain any health care insurance; indeed, no one in the federal government possessed the authority or ability to enforce any monetary penalty. The unenforceability of the penalty, as in analogous cases, made it impossible to trace any injury to the government. The states also were unable to meet the traceability requirement because any possible injury was not connected to “the defendant’s allegedly unlawful conduct,” for no such conduct had occurred.

Justice Thomas concurred. “Today’s result is thus not the consequence of the Court once again rescuing the Act, but rather of us adjudicating the particular claims the plaintiffs chose to bring.” And those claims had “not identified any unlawful action that has injured them.”

Justice Alito, joined by Justice Gorsuch, dissented. He concluded that repeal of the monetary penalty, declared a “tax” in NFIB v. Sebelius, created “huge financial costs on the states.” Yet the Court concluded those costs did not demonstrate standing to sue. Other recent decisions of the Court were “selectively generous in allowing States to sue.” This included cases in which the state’s claims “depended on a speculative chain of events.” The speculation in those cases was at least as broad as in the present case. Justice Alito claimed the decision to deny Texas standing was “remarkable,” for it and other states “have standing for reasons that are straightforward and meritorious.” He reasoned the claim was traceable because it demonstrated a causal connection between the state’s financial injury and the federal government’s complained-of conduct. The states were the possible subject of costly federal enforcement actions if they failed to comply with federally-imposed obligations. Both the reporting requirements and the duty to offer “expensive health insurance coverage for their employees” were “traceable to the looming threat of enforcement actions.” He rejected the majority’s conclusion that the alleged injury be traceable to an unlawful action or to an unconstitutional law. That would wrongly intertwine questions of jurisdiction with a substantive issue regarding the merits of the complaint.

Insert in Chapter 1 § D.1.b. at page 72:

RUCHO V. COMMON CAUSE, 588 U.S. ___, 139 S. Ct. 2484 (2019) — Plaintiffs in North Carolina and Maryland sued alleging state-created congressional districting maps were gerrymandered to protect incumbents, in the former state to protect Republicans, and in the latter, to protect Democrats. The Supreme Court held that claims of politically partisan gerrymanders raised political questions rather than legal questions, and dismissed the case.

The Court, in an opinion by Chief Justice Roberts, initially noted that no evidence existed that the courts enjoyed the constitutional power to fix political gerrymanders. It then distinguished Baker v. Carr and cases allowing courts to remedy racial gerrymandering, concluding political partisan gerrymandering “claims have proved far more difficult to adjudicate.” That was because the last was constitutionally permissible in some senses. After all, the Court noted, “[t]o hold that legislators cannot take partisan interests into account when drawing district lines would essentially countermand the Framers’ decision to entrust districting to political entities.” The Court concluded, “different visions of fairness” generated “basic questions that are political, not legal.” No constitutionally-based legal standards existed to allow the Court to make judgments, much less “limited and precise standards that are clear, manageable, and politically neutral.”

In dissent, Justice Kagan, for the four dissenters, began by raising the stakes: “For the first time ever, this Court refuses to remedy a constitutional violation because it thinks the task beyond judicial capabilities.” This constitutional violation “deprived citizens of the most fundamental of their constitutional rights: the rights to participate equally in the political process, to join with others to advance political beliefs, and to choose their political representatives.” Partisan gerrymandering thus violated the equal protection, free speech, and elections clauses. The dissent noted that the Court’s claims of an absence of constitutionally-based legal standards was refuted by the existence of lower court decisions creating such standards, using “as a baseline a State’s own criteria of fairness, apart from partisan gain.” In addition, the dissent concluded that manageable and politically neutral standards did exist, as lower federal courts had already used in deciding prior politically partisan gerrymandering cases.

Insert in Chapter 1§ E. at page 76:

The Appendix to Chief Justice Roberts’s 2020 Year-End Report on the Federal Judiciary noted the number of filings for the year ending September 30, 2020, was down significantly, to 5,411 filings, a drop of 1,031 filings from the October 2018 Term. That represented a decline of 16%. The total number of cases filed in the Court’s paid docket declined 7%, to 1,481. This was the second year in a row that paid filings decreased 7%. The Court heard arguments in 73 cases in October Term 2019, the same as the previous year, and disposed of 69 (again, the same) in 53 signed opinions. Four cases were decided by per curiam opinion.

Insert in Chapter 2 § C. at page 181:

MURPHY V. NCAA, 584 U.S. ___, 138 S. Ct. 1461 (2018)—Congress adopted the Professional and Amateur Sports Protection Act (PASPA) in 1991. The Act made it unlawful for a state to “sponsor, operate, advertise, promote, license, or authorize” any sports gambling scheme. The Act grandfathered the sports gambling operations of four states, including Nevada. For the Court, Justice Alito held that PASPA violated the anticommandeering principle of the Tenth Amendment, based on the structural concept of dual sovereignty. The majority noted that “conspicuously absent from the list of [enumerated] powers given to Congress is the power to issue direct orders to the governments of the United States.” PASPA’s prohibition on states authorizing sports gambling unconstitutionally placed state legislatures “under the direct control of Congress.” Because Congress possesses the power to regulate persons, not governments, PASPA’s regulation of the latter violated the structure of the Constitution. The Court also reaffirmed the anti-commandeering principle: It promotes individual liberty, political accountability, and “prevents Congress from shifting the costs of regulation to the States.” The Court also rejected (calling it “empty”) the distinction between compelling a state to enact legislation, as in New York v. United States, and prohibiting a state from doing so.

AFTERWORD—States almost immediately began to adopt legislation establishing and regulating sports gambling operations. Congress has made no effort to adopt legislation regulating sports gambling nationwide, which it is empowered to do pursuant to its commerce clause power.

Insert in Chapter 3 § B. at page 232:

LUCIA V. SEC, 585 U.S. ___, 138 S. Ct. 2044 (2018) — The Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) has the authority to enforce violations of its regulations through the administrative process. It initiated an enforcement action against Raymond Lucia, charging him with engaging in actions that violated the SEC’s anti-fraud regulations adopted to enforce the Investment Advisers Act. An administrative law judge (ALJ) was assigned by the SEC to decide the matter. The ALJ found Lucia had violated the regulations. The SEC affirmed the ALJ’s conclusion and remedy. On appeal, Lucia claimed the ALJ was not constitutionally appointed. The Court agreed. It held that ALJs are “Officers of the United States,” and thus must be appointed by the President, “Courts of Law,” or “Heads of Departments,” pursuant to Art. II, § 2, cl. 2. The ALJs working at the SEC had been selected by SEC staff members, not the Commissioners of the SEC. The ALJs were officers of the United States because they held a continuing office created by statute, and possessed some significant authority in the exercise of the power they were given.

SEILA LAW LLC V. CONSUMER FINANCIAL PROTECTION BD., 591 U.S. ___, 140 S. Ct. 2183 (2020) — In the aftermath of the Great Recession of 2007-09, Congress adopted the Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protections Act. Dodd-Frank created the Consumer Financial Protection Board (CFPB) with “vast” power to make rules, enforce them, adjudicate alleged violations of administrative regulations, issue subpoenas and civil investigative demands, and seek a variety of remedies for violations related to consumer debt issues. The CFPB is an independent agency. Unlike “nearly every other independent administrative agency” (such as the Federal Trade Commission), the CFPB is not a multimember commission, but led by one Director. The Director is appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate to a five-year term. The Director may be removed only upon a showing of “inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office.” Funding for the CFPB’s operations is through the Federal Reserve, not Congress.

The CFPB issued a civil investigative demand to petitioner Seila Law, which offered legal services for those in debt. Seila Law claimed the law creating a single Director removable only for cause violated separation of powers. The Court, in an opinion by Chief Justice Roberts, agreed. Early in the Court’s opinion it noted the President’s power to remove those “who wield executive power follows from the text of Article II, was settled by the First Congress, and was confirmed in the landmark decision of Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52 (1926).” It then noted precedent acknowledged just two exceptions to the President’s removal power: first, in Humphreys’ Executor v. United States, 295 U.S. 602 (1935), it held Congress could create an expert agency of a “group of principal officers” removable for good cause only; and second, some “inferior officers with narrowly defined duties” could be given “tenure” by Congress. The Court decided not to extend these exceptions to an independent agency led by a single Director, claiming “compelling reasons” not to do so. Those compelling reasons were based, the Court decided, on the absence of a “historical practice” of an independent agency like the CFPB, and a structural concern of “concentrating power in a unilateral actor insulated from Presidential control.”

The Court concluded that the Humphreys's Executor exception was inapplicable in part because in that case the Court held the Federal Trade Commission was not exercising executive power, but performed administrative duties “as a legislative or as a judicial aid.” It possessed some executive “function,” but no executive power. The Court then noted this conclusion in Humphreys's Executor “has not withstood the test of time.” The Court also noted that Humphreys's Executor was based on the additional view that the FTC was a nonpartisan (no more than three of its five members could be from one political party) commission of experts (five) with staggered terms. The second exception for inferior officers was recognized in Morrison v. Olson, which required the President to show good cause for removing an independent counsel.

Neither Humphreys's Executor nor Morrison answered the question at issue. The CFPB Director was neither nonpartisan nor part of a group of experts, nor was the Director “a mere legislative or judicial aid.” Additionally, the Director’s power to seek monetary penalties from private parties in federal court was “a quintessentially executive power not considered in Humphreys's Executor.” Morrison was inapt because the Director, “[e]veryone agrees,” is a principal officer, not an inferior officer.

The Court then refused to create a third exception because the CFPB “has no basis in history and no place in our constitutional structure.” The few (four) historical examples of “good-cause tenure to principal officers” “shed little light.” In none of them did the officer have the power to exercise “regulatory or enforcement authority remotely comparable to that exercised by the CFPB.” As a matter of structure, the CFPB was impermissible because it concentrated power in a person rather than dispersed it. And that person was “neither elected by the people nor meaningfully controlled (through the threat of removal) by someone who is.” And the Director’s budget was not subject to congressional control, nor to the President’s authority to recommend or veto spending bills.

Chief Justice Roberts’s remedy was joined only by Justices Alito and Kagan. He concluded that the removal of the Director was severable from other provisions creating the CFPB. Its existence was saved.

Justice Thomas, joined by Justice Gorsuch, concurred in part and dissented in part. He urged the Court to “repudiate” Humphreys's Executor in a future case because it “poses a direct threat to our constitutional structure and, as a result, the liberty of the American people.” Justice Thomas then offered a lengthy history and critique of the case.

Justice Kagan, with three other Justices, concurred in the judgment with respect to severability and dissented concerning the constitutionality of the CFPB’s single Director structure. She began by urging judicial restraint and representation reinforcement, noting that, as a matter of history, “this Court has left most decisions about how to structure the Executive Branch to Congress and the President, acting through legislation they both agree to.” The text of the Constitution, which does not “speak of removal,” thus allows “these common for-cause removal limits.” Justice Kagan then explained why the text of the Constitution, including the “vesting” or “executive power” and “take care” clauses, was insufficient to justify a broad power to remove executive officers. As a matter of history, “[f]rom the first, Congress debated and enacted measures to create spheres of administration — especially of financial affairs — detached from direct presidential control.” She then looked at specific aspects of American constitutional history, including the “Decision of 1789,” which concerned congressional debate regarding the President’s power to remove an executive officer. In her reading, the “best view” of this debate was that “the First Congress was ‘deeply divided’ on the President’s removal power and ‘never squarely addressed’ the central issue here.” Other decisions by Congress over the years to restrain presidential control of “financial regulators” indicated a historical record at odds with the majority’s conclusion. Finally, prior decisions of the Court “accepted the role of independent agencies in our governmental system.” She disagreed with the majority’s (and concurrence’s) understanding of Humphreys’ Executor in the Court’s jurisprudence. Nor did she agree with the Court’s interpretation of the Morrison decision. Finally, Justice Kagan returned to the idea of judicial restraint.

In Section II, Justice Kagan explained that “[a]pplying our longstanding precedent” made the CFPB’s structure constitutional. It was similar to the FTC, which the Court held constitutional, as the CFPB “wields the same kind of power as the FTC and similar agencies.” Justice Kagan rejected the Court’s distinction between single and multimember commissions for several reasons. First, the two exceptions listed by the Court were “made up.” Second, the single Director structure “has a fair bit of precedent behind it.” Here, the Court and the dissent disagreed about the import of the four instances. Third, “novelty is not the test of constitutionality when it comes to structuring agencies.”

COLLINS V. YELLEN, 594 U.S. ___, 141 S. Ct. 1761 (2021) — During the Great Recession, Congress adopted a law created the Federal Housing Finance Agency (FHFA). The FHFA was led by its Director, who was confirmed by the Senate. The Director could be removed from office by the President only “for cause.” The FHFA was an “independent agency” given the authority to regulate the mortgage financing companies Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. Both companies were placed into conservatorship by the Director. The Treasury department and the companies negotiated agreements on a loan, with the latter receiving dividends and preferred shares from the former. Some Freddie Mac shareholders sued, claiming the FHFA’s structure permitting the Director’s removal only for cause violates separation of powers. The Court, in an opinion by Justice Alito, agreed.

The Court found a “straightforward application of our reasoning in Seila Law dictates the result here.” The Court focused on the importance of removing subordinates to undertake effectively the exercise of the President’s power. “The removal power helps the President maintain a degree of control over the subordinates he needs to carry out his duties as the head of the Executive Branch, and it works to ensure that these subordinates serve the people effectively and in accordance with the policies that the people presumably elected the President to promote.” Such power relatedly aided the people by promote accountability in the President.

Justice Kagan concurred in the judgment on the separation of powers issue. She had dissented in Seila Law, but agreed with the Court that the present case was covered by Seila Law. She disagreed with the Court's reasoning in two respects: First, the Court's understanding of "how our government should work" was "deeply flawed." Accountability for the structure of an independent agency rested with Congress. Second, The Court extended the applicability of Seila Law to single-director agencies that did not wield significant executive power, resulting in her concurring only in the judgment.

Justice Sotomayor, joined by Justice Breyer, and dissented on the separation of powers issue. She concluded the FHFA did not wield significant executive power, as was the case in Seila Law. Consequently, "this Court's decisions upholding for-cause removal provisions" should apply. The unusual position of the Director, regulating government-sponsored entities Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, made it akin to the independent counsel, removable only for some causes, upheld in Morrison v. Olson (1988). Additionally, the FHFA's independence was "supported by historical tradition."

Insert in Chapter 3 § C. at page 245:

TRUMP V. VANCE, 591 U.S. ___, 140 S. Ct. 2412 (2020) — The Court began by noting “[t]his case involves — so far as we and the parties can tell — the first state criminal subpoena directed to a President.” It unanimously held that neither the Supremacy Clause nor Article II forbids a state from issuing such a subpoena, nor does the Constitution require the state to show a heightened standard for issuing such a subpoena. The initial argument that the President enjoyed “absolute immunity from state criminal process” while in office was rejected. The Court extensively discussed the treason trial of Aaron Burr, including Burr’s request for a subpoena duces tecum to President Thomas Jefferson. Chief Justice John Marshall, presiding at the treason trial, held the President was not immune from a subpoena. This precedent, the Court noted, had been followed ever since, including in United States v. Nixon and Clinton v. Jones. The Court then concluded that this federal precedent applied to state subpoenas as well. No heightened need standard was required before issuance of the subpoena because 1) this “would extend protection designed for official documents to the President’s private papers,” 2) no evidence of harassment interfering with the President’s exercise of his duties was shown, and 3) “the public interest in fair and effective law enforcement cuts in favor of comprehensive access to evidence.” Then, despite rejecting this heightened need standard, the Court discussed some ways in which the President differed from ordinary citizens, as his Article II powers provided additional challenges to subpoenas ordinary citizens lacked. This seemed to suggest a type of heightened need even though formally rejected. The case was remanded for further proceedings.

Justice Kavanaugh concurred in the judgment, joined by Justice Gorsuch. He concurred because he would adopt the requirement in United States v. Nixon that the prosecutor demonstrate a specific need for the information.

Both Justices Thomas and Alito wrote what were denominated dissenting opinions, though both agreed that the President was not immune from state criminal processes while in office. Their dissents differed slightly. Justice Thomas’s dissent focused on the President’s entitlement to a remedy from enforcement of the subpoena. In his view, if the President met the legal standard in Burr, he was entitled to equitable relief from enforcement of the subpoena while in office. Justice Alito raised the stakes, noting that the questions of the extent of the operation of the state’s criminal processes as applied to the President of the United States were “important questions that go to the very structure of the Government created by the Constitution.” He concluded the President could not be prosecuted by a state executive officer, but a former President could. Justice Alito then discussed the slippery slope problem if a President was subject to state criminal processes. This led him to conclude that some heightened standard of need was required for the subpoena to issue.

TRUMP V. MAZARS USA, LLP, 591 U.S. ___, 140 S. Ct. 2019 (2020) — In a near companion case to Trump v. Vance, the Court held that subpoenas issued to the President, his children, and several affiliated businesses (including his accounting firm, Mazars) by several committees of the House of Representatives were too broad to be enforced. As the Court mentioned in Vance, this was an extraordinarily unusual case: “We have never addressed a congressional subpoena for the President’s information.” That a congressional committee issued the subpoena to the President was “distinctive,” and made an important difference from Burr, Nixon, Clinton v. Jones, and even Vance. Chief Justice Roberts’s opinion noted that separation of powers disputes rarely “ended up in court.” Instead, they were settled politically, and old and modern examples were offered. The Court rejected the Nixon “specific need” requirement, holding it inapt for “nonprivileged, private information.” Unlike Vance, the Court held important the fact that the President was the subject of the subpoena. The separation of powers concerns made it impossible for the judiciary to defer to the House’s claims; otherwise, there existed “essentially no limits on the congressional power to subpoena the President’s personal records.” That would alter the structural design of the Constitution. The Court then acknowledged the fact that the subpoenas were part of a “clash between rival branches of government over records of intense political interest for all involved.” The result was a “balancing” test for courts, one that analyzed the “separation of powers principles at stake, including both the significant interests of Congress and the ‘unique position of the President.’” Those considerations included 1) whether Congress’s asserted legislative purpose warranted Presidential involvement, 2) a subpoena “no broader than reasonably necessary” to effectuate Congress’s legislative goal, 3) assessment of the evidence offered to explain why the President’s papers should be the subject of the subpoena, and 4) assessment of the burdens on the President in complying with the subpoena.

Justice Thomas dissented, concluding that “Congress has no power to issue legislative subpoenas for the President’s private, nonofficial information.” But it might “be able to obtain these documents as part of an investigation of the President” pursuant to its impeachment power. (President Trump had been impeached and acquitted, but not in relation to these subpoenas.) After an exhaustive discussion of the history of legislative subpoenas, he would overrule precedent and hold “the Committees have no constitutional authority to subpoena private, nonofficial documents.” Instead, they should have used the House’s impeachment power, which includes “a power to investigate and demand documents.”

Insert in Chapter 3 § D.2. at page 246:

GUNDY V. UNITED STATES, 588 U.S. ___, 139 S. Ct. 2116 (2019) — Gundy was convicted of a sex crime in 2005, the year before Congress adopted the Sexual Offender Registration and Notification Act (SORNA). One provision of SORNA gives the Attorney General the authority to “specify the applicability of the requirements of this subchapter to sex offenders convicted before the enactment of this chapter.” It also allows the Attorney General to “prescribe rules for the registration of any such sex offenders . . . who are unable to comply with” the registration requirements. Gundy claimed this language violated the nondelegation doctrine. A plurality of four justices, in an opinion by Justice Kagan, held SORNA provided an “intelligible principle” to the Attorney General, thus meeting the requirements of the nondelegation doctrine.

Justice Alito concurred in the judgment, noting that “since, 1935, the Court has uniformly rejected nondelegation arguments and has upheld provisions that authorized agencies to adopt important rules pursuant to extraordinarily capacious standards.” He then declared his willingness to reconsider this uniform rejection if a majority of the Court were inclined to do so. Because Justice Kavanaugh did not participate in this case, a possible majority for such action was lacking. Thus, Justice Alito concurred on the ground that “I cannot say that the statute lacks a discernable standard that is adequate under the approach this Court has taken for many years.”

The three dissenters, in an opinion by Justice Gorsuch, concluded the authority accorded the Attorney General was “vast,” that it gave the Attorney General “free rein” to adopt, withdraw, selectively apply, or not apply at all, registration of the approximately 500,000 pre-SORNA sex offenders. He concluded this grant of authority was so vast it violated the structure of the Constitution, which gave to the Congress, not the executive branch, legislative powers herein granted. A violation of the structure of the Constitution threatened the liberty of Americans by displacing accountability for making laws from Congress to the President. The test of when Congress had unconstitutionally violated the nondelegation doctrine should not be a mutated version of an “intelligible principle,” for that “has no basis in the original meaning of the Constitution, in history, or even in the decision from which it was [initially] plucked.” The dissenters then suggested that a future majority would (and should) look at this issue differently.

Insert in Chapter 4 § B.2.b. at page 284:

SOUTH DAKOTA V. WAYFAIR, 585 U.S. ___, 138 S. Ct. 2080 (2018) — The South Dakota legislature adopted, and the governor signed, a bill requiring companies that deliver more than $100,000 worth of goods within South Dakota to remit sales taxes to the state even when the delivering company has no physical presence in the state. The South Dakota act was held unconstitutional by the South Dakota Supreme Court on the ground that it contradicted a 1992 case, Quill Corp. v. North Dakota, 504 U.S. 298. Quill required a company to have a physical presence in a state for the latter to require the former to remit sales taxes. The Supreme Court overruled its decision in Quill, and held the act constitutional.

The Court, in an opinion by Justice Kennedy, began its re-assessment with reference to “two primary principles”: One, states may not discriminate against interstate commerce, and two, states may not impose undue burdens on interstate commerce. The Court found three reasons suggesting Quill was wrongly decided: First, the physical presence rule did not mean the company was not engaged in a taxable activity in the taxing state. Second, Quill created rather than calmed market distortions. Third, “Quill imposes the sort of arbitrary, formalistic distinction that the Court’s modern Commerce Clause precedents disavow.” Maintaining the physical presence rule did not reduce or even affect any state discrimination against interstate commerce. It did, of course, place businesses with a physical presence in a state at a competitive disadvantage against out-of-state sellers, for the latter did not have to collect sales tax, often making the overall purchase price of a good less expensive to the purchaser. This was a market distortion, and no constitutional rule required the Commerce Clause to favor those who did business in a state without also having a physical presence there. Finally, formalism failed to account for the more sensitive case by case approach that assessed both purposes and effects in determining the constitutionality of the state’s law or action.

The dissent by Chief Justice Roberts, for the four dissenters, emphasized the “heightened form of stare decisis in the dormant Commerce Clause context.” Because Congress enjoys the power to override any decision of the Court regarding the dormant Commerce Clause, and has not chosen to do so, the Court should stay its hand.

TENNESSEE WINE AND SPIRITS RETAILERS ASS’N V. THOMAS, 588 US. ___, 139 S. Ct. 2449 (2019) — The Court, in an opinion by Justice Alito, held discriminatory and thus violative of the dormant Commerce Clause a Tennessee law requiring any person desiring to open and operate a retail liquor store to have resided in the state for two years. Other regulations limited the operation of liquor stores based on additional residency requirements. The laws clearly discriminated based on state residency, which ordinarily would mean the law was subject to the “virtually per se rule of invalidity.” The issue was whether such discrimination was permissible because of the Twenty-First Amendment. That amendment both ended prohibition and permitted states, in section 2, to regulate the transportation or importation into any state of intoxicating liquors in violation of state law. The Court held “the Commerce Clause did not permit the States to impose protectionist measures clothed as police-power regulations.” Section 2 of the Twenty-

First Amendment did not give states the authority to violate the Commerce Clause's principle of nondiscrimination.

Insert in Chapter 5 §B.3. at page 351:

RAMOS V. LOUISIANA, 590 U.S. ___, 140 S. Ct. 1390 (2020) — In a 6-3 decision in which a no majority existed in many parts of the case, the Court held the Sixth Amendment’s guarantee of a right to a trial “by an impartial jury” implicitly includes a right to a unanimous verdict of guilty applicable to state criminal trials. This right to a unanimous verdict was one of the very few rights not earlier incorporated into the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. On whether a unanimous verdict was required to convict, the Court, in an opinion by Justice Gorsuch, held “the answer is unmistakable.” As a matter of common law, state practices, and treatise writers (including Blackstone) at the time the Sixth Amendment was proposed and ratified (1789 and 1791, respectively), a person was guilty only if the jury unanimously agreed. The “original public meaning” of the Amendment was understood at the time and later to include unanimity within the phrase “by an impartial jury.” The right to trial by an impartial jury applied to state criminal trials as well as federal trials because it was “fundamental to the American scheme of justice.” A plurality of the Court held that two badly split 1972 decisions, Apodaca v. Oregon, 406 U.S. 404 (1972) and Johnson v. Louisiana, 406 U.S. 356 (1972), which did not apply the unanimity requirement to the only two states permitting non-unanimous convictions, were not controlling due to the unclear ratio decidendi of the cases. Stare decisis did not require continue application of Apodaca and Johnson, and a majority overruled them. The Court also noted at the beginning of its opinion that the adoption of non-unanimous jury verdicts in both the Louisiana (1898) and Oregon (1930s) were propelled by discrimination on the basis of race and religion.

Justice Thomas concurred in the judgment on the ground that precedent of more than a century declaring a right to a unanimous jury verdict was “not demonstrably erroneous” and thus subject to stare decisis. Justice Sotomayor largely concurred, focusing on why overruling was compelled, especially compared with other recent cases overruling precedent with which she disagreed. She also noted the “racially based origins of the Louisiana and Oregon laws uniquely matter here.” Justice Kavanaugh concurred in part to emphasize why stare decisis did not prevent the Court from overruling Apodaca.

Justice Alito dissented, joined by Chief Justice Roberts and largely by Justice Kagan. He began by noting that both Louisiana and Oregon reaffirmed laws permitting non-unanimous criminal jury verdicts in non-racial terms. Thus, though its origins were “deplorable,” they were irrelevant to the constitutional issue before the Court. Second, Justice Alito rejected the plurality’s conclusion that Apodaca was not a precedent, citing other opinions of the Court citing Apodaca as precedent that unanimous criminal jury verdicts were not required in state cases. Third, he argued Apodaca was consistent with stare decisis.

Insert in Chapter 5 at § D.1. at page 362:

MANHATTAN COMM. ACCESS CORP. V. HALLECK, 587 U.S. ___, 139 S. Ct. 360 (2019) — Cable operating companies are required by New York law to set aside public access channels. These are to be operated by the company unless the local government chooses to operate it. New York City designated a private nonprofit corporation, Manhattan Neighborhood Network (MNN), to operate the public access channels. Two residents used the public access channels to air a film critical of MNN. The film was shown. The residents were later suspended from using MNN services and facilities. The Supreme Court held that MNN was a private actor and thus not subject to the First Amendment. In a 5-4 opinion written by Justice Kavanaugh, the Court concluded that MNN was not exercising a public function “traditionally reserved to the states,” as required by Jackson v. Metropolitan Edison Co. The Court repeatedly noted that few functions are traditionally exclusively reserved to the states. Operating public access channels was neither traditionally nor exclusively reserved to state actors. It buttressed its conclusion by noting a variety of public access operators, both public and private, in the history of cable television. The Court rejected an effort to broaden the level of generality by claiming MNN was operating a public forum for speech. Hosting speech by others “is not a traditional, exclusive public function.” And such hosting efforts did not transform a private entity into a public one. Additionally, the Court concluded that the City never had “any property interest in Time Warner’s cable system, or in the public access channels on that system.” Its agreement to allow Time Warner to use public rights of way to lay cable wires was similar to allowing private utility operators, such as Metropolitan Edison, to use public rights of way.

Justice Sotomayor’s dissent noted that MNN was appointed by the local government to administer a public forum. This gave New York City a property interest in the cable access channels. By law those channels remained open to all. The City delegated to MNN the operation of these channels. MNN was an agent of the government and thus subject to the state action doctrine. The dissent also distinguished Jackson, on the ground that MNN is not a private entity like Metropolitan Edison.

Insert in Chapter 6 § A. at page 368:

BECKLES V. UNITED STATES, 580 U.S. ___, 137 S. Ct. 886 (2017) — Beckles was convicted of unlawfully possessing a firearm as a previously convicted felon. He challenged his sentence, based in part on a residual clause in the guidelines from the United States Sentencing Commission, as void for vagueness. The Court held that the advisory guidelines were not subject to a vagueness challenge under the Due Process Clause. The majority opinion by Justice Thomas concluded a vagueness challenge under the Due Process Clause could be made to “laws that define criminal offenses and laws that fix the permissible sentences for criminal offenses.” In Johnson v. United States, 576 U.S. ___, 135 S. Ct. 2551 (2015), the Court held violative of the Due Process Clause a statute that fixed permissible sentences “in an impermissibly vague way.” Johnson was irrelevant, the Court concluded, because in Beckles’s case, the advisory guidelines “do not fix the permissible range of sentences.” Instead, the guidelines “merely guide the exercise of a court’s discretion in choosing an appropriate sentence within the statutory range.”

Although the Court unanimous, Justices Kennedy, Ginsburg, and Sotomayor each wrote opinions concurring in the judgment. The latter two opinions took issue with the breadth of the Court’s conclusion. Justice Ginsburg concluded that the commentary stating possession of a sawed-off shotgun by a felon was a crime of violence was authoritative, making Beckles’s claim inapt. Because his conduct was clearly prohibited, Beckles was not permitted to complain on behalf of others. Justice Sotomayor’s opinion concurring in the judgment concluded that, in some instances, the guidelines should be subject to vagueness challenges, because of “the central role that the Guidelines play at sentencing.” In reaching this conclusion, Justice Sotomayor focused on the crucial functional role the Guidelines play in sentencing, not its formal role as advisory rather than as binding statements of law.

NELSON V. COLORADO, 581 U.S. ___, 137 S. Ct. 1249 (2017) — Nelson was convicted of several crimes in Colorado state court. She was sentenced and fined. Her conviction was reversed on appeal, and at the retrial she was acquitted. While serving a sentence after conviction and before its reversal on appeal, Nelson had some money in a state-held account. This money was withheld from her after her acquittal. In an opinion by Justice Ginsburg, the Court held Colorado’s action violated the Due Process Clause. Using the balancing test in Matthews v. Eldridge, the Court decided the interests of the individuals were great in receiving back their money, and the state’s interest negligible.

Concurring in the judgment, Justice Alito rejected the Matthews test in favor of the “fundamental and deeply rooted principle of justice” test in Medina v. California, 505 U.S. 437 (1992).

Justice Thomas dissented, arguing Nelson lacked a substantive entitlement to the money. He concluded once Nelson paid the state a sum of money as required by their sentence after conviction, it became public funds, and the Due Process Clause provided no substantive right to its return.

Insert in Chapter 6. § B. at page 368:

UNITED STATES V. DAVIS, 588 U.S. ___, 139 S. Ct. 2319 (2019) — Davis and Glover were convicted of carrying a firearm to commit a crime of violence in federal district court. They were also charged with and convicted of unlawfully using or carrying a firearm to aid a conspiracy to commit a crime of violence. The statute under which they were convicted included as an element of the offense a definition of a crime of violence: it “has as an element the use, attempted use, or threatened use of physical force against the person or property of another.” A residual clause in the statute defined an offense as a crime of violence if, “by its nature, [it] involves a substantial risk that physical force against the person or property of another may be used in the course of committing the offense.” Under this residual clause, the punishment could be enhanced. The Court held this residual provision unconstitutionally vague law. The Court, in an opinion by Justice Gorsuch, noted that vague laws “contravene the ‘first essential of due process of law’ that statutes must give people ‘of common intelligence’ fair notice of what the law demands of them.” (The Court also noted that vague laws violate separation of power because such laws give authority to define crimes to government officials other than Congress, all of whom are unaccountable to the people who are required to live in accordance with the law.)

In dissent for four justices, Justice Kavanaugh argued that the provision requiring the trial court to apply a risk standard to assess the defendant’s conduct is not impermissibly vague. He then noted the commonality of such standards in criminal laws, including laws that made it a federal crime to create “a substantial risk of serious bodily harm.” He concluded by noting the “consequences of the Court’s decision today will be severe.”

Insert in Chapter 6 § C.5.a. at page 446:

JUNE MEDICAL SERVS. V. RUSSO, 591 U.S. ___, 140 S. Ct. 2103 (2020) — In an unusual set of opinions, a plurality of the Court held unconstitutional a law requiring physicians who perform abortions to possess “active admitting privileges” at a hospital within 30 miles of the location where the abortions are performed. The law had not gone into effect before the lawsuit claiming it was unconstitutional was filed. The plurality concluded the statute was unconstitutional, just as was the case regarding a similar Texas statute in Whole Women’s Health v. Hellerstedt, 579 U.S. ___, 136 S. Ct. 2292 (2016). The plurality was joined in its judgment by Chief Justice Roberts, who dissented in Whole Women’s Health. He declared his continuing opinion that Whole Women’s Health was wrongly decided, but that he was bound by the principle of stare decisis, as the Louisiana law was “nearly identical” to the Texas law in Whole Women’s Health. All four of the dissenters wrote an opinion.

After holding the state’s claim that the plaintiffs lacked standing was waived (see Ch. 1 § D.1.a, above), the plurality assessed the costs and benefits of the proposed “admitting privileges” law. In a lengthy review of the facts, the plurality found the costs of the proposed law “would place substantial obstacles in the path of women seeking an abortion in Louisiana.” The “asserted benefits” of the proposed law, as found by the District Court, were “no significant health-related problem that the new law helped to cure.” The plurality held this factual finding was not clearly erroneous. Thus, upon this weighing or balancing, the law placed an “undue burden on a woman’s constitutional right to choose to have an abortion.”

Chief Justice Roberts’s opinion concurring in the judgment explicitly rejected the plurality’s claim that courts are “to weigh the law’s asserted benefits against the burdens it imposes on abortion access.” In his view, this kind of balancing test was impossible, arbitrary, and unpredictable, as it involved weighing interests such as protecting potential human life and the health of the woman against the woman’s liberty interest to define her “own concept of existence” (Casey): “There is no plausible sense in which anyone, let alone this Court, could objectively assign weight to such imponderable values and no meaningful way to compare them if there were.” Casey did not suggest “that a weighing of costs and benefits of an abortion regulation was a job for the courts.” Instead, Casey “focuses on the existence of a substantial obstacle, the sort of inquiry familiar to judges.”

Justice Thomas’s dissent, in addition to concluding the plaintiffs lacked standing, urged the Court to overrule its prior decisions on abortion, for the “Constitution does not constrain the States’ ability to regulate or even prohibit abortion.” The Court had “created the right to abortion based on an amorphous, unwritten right to privacy, which it grounded in the ‘legal fiction’ of substantive due process.” Justice Alito’s dissent on the substantive challenge, joined by Justice Gorsuch and Kavanaugh and largely by Justices Thomas, challenged the plurality’s claim that admitting privileges did not serve a valid purpose. He then criticized the conclusion that this case was a replay of Whole Women’s Health. The Louisiana law was challenged on its face; the Texas statute involved a “an empirical question, . . . the effect of the statute on access to abortion.” Further, the Texas law was challenged only after it was enforced; the Louisiana law never went into effect.

Justice Gorsuch’s dissent criticized the plurality’s unwillingness “to follow the traditional constraints of the judicial process when a case touching on abortion enters the courtroom.” He then listed several items in which he concluded the judicial process had been re-worked in a way inimical to the judicial process: “To arrive at today’s result, rules must be brushed aside and shortcuts taken.” The consequence was a “temptation to proceed [in] this direction, closer with each step toward an unobstructed exercise of will. . . . Today, in a highly politicized and contentious arena, we prove unwilling, or perhaps unable, to resist that temptation.”

Insert in Chapter 6 § D.1. at page 524:

MURR V. WISCONSIN, 582 U.S. ___, 137 S. Ct. 1933 (2017) — Murr family members claimed the Wisconsin Department of Natural Resources (DNR) regulated the use of their real property to such an extent that it constituted a regulatory taking. The Murrs owned two lots along the Lower St. Croix river. The DNR prohibited the Murrs and others with undeveloped land to build on the land if the amount of suitable land was less than one acre. The lots owned were each 1.25 acres, but the suitable land for building on each was 0.98 acres. In a 5-3 opinion (Justice Gorsuch did not participate), the Court, in an opinion by Justice Kennedy, held that no regulatory taking existed. The Court noted that the trial court found the Murrs had not been “deprived of all economic value of their property.” The regulations were found to cause a decrease in the value of the property of less than 10 percent, based on the assumption that the two lots were assessed as one whole parcel. The Court used “a number of factors,” including the physical characteristics of the land, the prospective value of the regulated land, the reasonable expectations of the landowners, and background customs and the whole of our legal tradition, in reaching its conclusion. This test was “objective.” The Court rejected the request by both parties for a “formalistic rule to guide the parcel inquiry,” and affirmed the lower court’s holding in favor of the state based on its multi-factor test of the two lots as one parcel.

Chief Justice Roberts dissented, concluding the Court went “astray” in its broad definition of private property. The Takings Clause protected “established property rights,” those rights to property as created and defined by state law. Instead of looking at the two lots as one contiguous whole, which he calls applying “a takings-specific definition of the property at issue,” courts should look at the lots under “general state law principles,” and thus, as “legally distinct parcels of land.”

Justice Thomas also dissented, and raised the issue of whether the concept of regulatory takings was part of the original meaning of the Takings Clause.

KNICK V. TOWNSHIP OF SCOTT, 588 U.S. ___, 139 S. Ct. 2162 (2019) — The Township of Scott, Pennsylvania, passed an ordinance regulating privately-owned properties in which cemeteries were located. The owner of the property was forbidden bar access to the “cemetery” to the general public during daylight hours. The owner could also not charge any fee before allowing access to the cemetery. The ordinance also granted an agent of the Township to enter any property in its jurisdiction to determine if a cemetery was on the property. An agent of the Township entered Knick’s property without a warrant and concluded certain stones on the property marked the location of graves. Knick sued in federal court, claiming an unconstitutional Fifth Amendment taking. Under earlier decisions of the Court, a person was unable to make a takings claim until all state-based claims were exhausted. Under this rule, Knick was required to initiate an inverse-condemnation proceeding and exhaust that legal pathway before starting a taking claim in federal court. Only then would the matter be ripe for federal adjudication. The difficulty with this legal rule was that, once a complainant failed to obtain just compensation from a state court, that decision precluded further litigation of the claim in federal court. The federal claim might finally be ripe but the complainant's claim would be dismissed. The Court, in an opinion by Chief Justice Roberts, noted the plaintiff found herself in a legal Catch-22. The Court overruled precedent, holding it "imposes an unjustifiable burden on takings' plaintiffs." The Court held that the Taking Clause was self-executing, and thus once the taking occurred, a federal claim based on the Takings Clause immediately arose.

Justice Kagan, for four dissenters, argued that the Court's decision went too far in requiring the government to pay just compensation before taking property or be held to have violated the Takings Clause. By requiring advance payment, the Court overturned precedents that stretched over a century. Consequently, the Court's claim of a Catch-22 was inapt: a constitutional violation did not occur, past cases agreed, until the landowner failed to obtain just compensation. Finally, the Court's decision to overrule precedent was founded merely on its conclusion that the earlier case was wrong. That is not sufficient under stare decisis to overrule.

CEDAR POINT NURSERY V. HASSID, 594 U.S. ___, 141 S. Ct. 2063 (2021) — California law required agricultural employers to allow union organizers access to their property to solicit support or membership in a union, up to three hours (one hour before work, one hour during lunch, and one hour after work) for up to 120 days. The Court, in an opinion by Chief Justice Roberts, held the law unconstitutional, as a per se physical taking of the employer's property. The law constituted a physical taking because it "appropriates a right to invade the growers' property." The owners enjoyed a right "to exclude" others from their property, and the access requirement was a "government-authorized physical invasion[]" requiring just compensation. That access was limited to three hours per day for up to 120 days bore only on the amount of just compensation, not whether the taking was a physical or regulatory taking. It rejected the slippery slope argument that its decision would affect a host of other regulations of private business. For example, it concluded, "government health and safety inspections regimes will generally not constitute takings." A grant of a government benefit, such as a permit, conditioned on allowing access for police power interests, will ordinarily not be characterized as a taking.

The dissent by Justice Breyer, for himself and Justices Sotomayor and Kagan, argued the California access law was better understood as a regulation. California neither physically appropriated the property nor cause its permanent physical occupation by another. The law allowed merely a temporary invasion of property. That temporary invasion was a regulatory taking only if the temporary invasion went "too far," in Justice Holmes's famous conclusion in Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Mahon (1922). California, on balance, had not gone too far, so the temporary invasion should be characterized as a regulation rather than a regulatory taking. The Court's contrary conclusion "threatens to make many ordinary forms of regulation unusually complex or impractical."

Insert in Chapter 7 § E. at page 644:

SESSIONS V. MORALES-SANTANA, 582 U.S. ___, 137 S. Ct. 1678 (2017) — Morales-Santana was born in the Dominican Republic. His mother was a citizen of the Dominican Republic. His father, Jose Morales, was born in Puerto Rico and lived there until 20 days before his nineteenth birthday, when he moved to the Dominican Republic for work. Decades later, Morales fathered Morales-Santana, and a decade after the birth of Morales-Santana, the couple married. Morales-Santana lived in the Dominican Republic until moving to the United States (first Puerto Rico, then New York City) when he was thirteen. After several convictions, Morales-Santana was made subject to removal proceedings. He claimed American birth citizenship based on his father’s status as an American citizen. Under federal law, because Jose Morales left Puerto Rico before spending five years in the United States after the age of fourteen, Jose Morales was not an American citizen, and therefore, neither was Morales-Santana. If Morales-Santana’s mother had been an American citizen, and given birth while unwed, Morales-Santana would have received American citizenship based on his mother’s citizenship. The Court held that Morales-Santana could “vindicate his father’s right to the equal protection of the laws.” It held an exception existed to the rule that a party can protect or advance only one’s own rights, for there was a “close relationship” between father and son and Jose Morales’s failure to assert his own claims to American citizenship created a “hindrance” to Morales-Santana’s ability to effectuate his own interests in claiming American citizenship. The gender-based distinction in according citizenship to the children of mothers and fathers was unconstitutional as it reflected overbroad gender stereotypes. Although the law violated the Equal Protection Clause, the Court reversed the Second Circuit because it disagreed with the remedy to be applied.

Insert in Chapter 8 § A.4. at page 660:

PACKINGHAM V. NORTH CAROLINA, 582 U.S. ___, 137 S. Ct. 1730 (2017) — Registered sex offenders in North Carolina committed a felony if they gained “access [to] a commercial social networking Web site where the sex offender knows that the site permits minor children to become members or to create or maintain personal Web pages.” Packingham created a Facebook account. He was prosecuted for and convicted of violating the act. The Court held the law violated the Free Speech Clause. The act contradicted the “fundamental principle of the First Amendment [] that all persons have access to places where they can speak and listen, and then, after reflection, speak and listen once more.” The unanimous opinion for the Court was written by Justice Kennedy. The Court concluded the statute was “unprecedented in the scope of First Amendment speech it burdens.” Even if the Court adopted intermediate scrutiny, the law was unconstitutional because it was not narrowly tailored and burdened substantially more speech than necessary to effectuate the government’s interests.

Justice Alito, joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Thomas, concurred in the judgment. They agreed the statute’s “staggering reach” and “extraordinary breadth” made it unconstitutional, but rejected the Court’s “undisciplined dicta,” which incorrectly suggested “that the States are largely powerless to restrict even the most dangerous sexual predators from visiting any internet sites, including, for example, teenage dating sites and sites designed to permit minors to discuss personal problems with their peers.” Though the state had a compelling interest in preventing sexual abuse of children, the act swept so broadly that it banned registered sex offenders from accessing “a large number of websites that are most unlikely to facilitate the commission of a sex crime against a child,” such as Amazon.com and WebMD. The concurrence also disagreed with the Court’s analogy of cyberspace to public streets and parks. In Justice Alito’s view, parents were much more capable of monitoring the physical locations their children visited than cyberspace locations. Further, it was easier for the public to visually observe a sex offender loitering in a public space than in cyberspace.

MATAL V. TAM, 582 U.S. ___, 137 S. Ct. 1744 (2017) — The Patent and Trademark Office (PTO) refused to register as a trademark “THE SLANTS,” which is the name of a rock band consisting of Asian-Americans. The band wanted to “reclaim” this derogatory name for Americans of Asian descent. The PTO justified its decision on a federal statute prohibiting the registration of any trademark that may “disparage . . . or bring . . . into contemp[t] or disrepute” any persons living or dead. The Court, in an opinion by Justice Alito, held this provision violated the Free Speech Clause. The Court was unanimous that the speech regulated by federal law was private speech, not government speech. They agreed that PTO registration does not indicate governmental approval of a message, nor does it convey a public message. It also differed from Walker because specialty license plates messages have been long used by states to convey messages, are identified with the state in the public mind, and the state maintains control over the messages conveyed. Justice Alito concluded the law unconstitutionally banned speech “on the ground that it expresses ideas that offend.”

Two pluralities (Justice Gorsuch did not participate) differed on the justifications for this conclusion. Justice Alito concluded this case was unlike any case in which the government provided a cash subsidy or other financial support for the speech. He also rejected a speech doctrine related to cases involving a “government program.” Finally, Justice Alito rejected the argument that the disparagement provision was constitutional because it regulated commercial speech alone. The plurality decided that, even if a trademark was commercial speech, the law failed the Central Hudson test regarding when commercial speech may be regulated.

Justice Kennedy, joined by Justices Ginsburg, Sotomayor, and Kagan, concurred in part and concurred in the judgment. They agreed with the conclusion that the law was unconstitutional viewpoint discrimination, and expanded on the reasons “why the First Amendment’s protections against viewpoint discrimination apply to the trademark here.” That discussion led Justice Kennedy to ignore “other questions raised by the parties.” The government “singled out a subset of messages for disfavor based on the views expressed,” for the registrant could register a “positive or benign mark but not a derogatory one.” This disapproval of a particular message “is the essence of viewpoint discrimination.”

IANCU V. BRUNETTI, 588 U.S. ___, 139 S. Ct. 782 (2019) — The Patent and Trademark Office (PTO) denied federal registration of FUCT, on the ground that its statutory authority permitted it to reject “immoral” or “scandalous” trademarks. The Court held the PTO’s decision violated the Free Speech Clause. The decision was a sequel to Matal v. Tam. FUCT is a clothing line, and the company name was supposed to be spoken as four letters, F, U, C, T, not as a word. The provisions banning immoral or scandalous trademarks were deemed a type of explicit viewpoint discrimination by the government, which is banned by the First Amendment.

Dissenting in part, Chief Justice Roberts concluded that a future trademark registration system may, “under our precedents,” ban “obscene, vulgar, or profane marks.” Both Justices Breyer and Sotomayor, also dissenting in part, concluded that a narrow interpretation of the statute would permit a denial of the registration of FUCT on grounds that it is a scandalous mark, given the clothing line included children’s clothes. The harm to First Amendment interests was slight, and the government possessed legitimate interests. As noted by Justice Sotomayor, a private company was not required to register a trademark in order to use it. Additionally, a trademark granted the holder a largely commercial benefit, making the plaintiff’s First Amendment interests relatively modest. Both Breyer and Sotomayor concurred in part because they agreed with the conclusion that prohibiting “immoral” trademarks was unconstitutional.

MINNESOTA VOTERS ALLIANCE V. MANSKY, 585 U.S. ___, 138 S. Ct. 1876 (2018) — A Minnesota law banned voters (and others) from wearing any “political badge, political button, or other political insignia” in a polling location. Whether some apparel met this definition and was thus banned was determined by state election judges. The Court held the ban unconstitutional. The ban applied only to polling locations, which are a nonpublic forum. The test was whether the ban was reasonable and not intended to suppress speech disfavored by government. The Court held limitations on campaign advocacy near polling places was constitutionally permissible. However, the statute did not define “political,” and the state’s interpretive guidance regarding several categories of banned apparel was unreasonable. One category of banned apparel was “issue oriented material designed to influence or impact voting.” A second was items “promoting a group with recognizable political views,” which was so broad that application of this category was subject to idiosyncratic and thus unconstitutional application.

NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF FAMILY AND LIFE ADVOCATES V. BECERRA, 585 U.S. ___, 138 S. Ct. 2361 (2018) — California adopted a law requiring crisis pregnancy centers to display certain notices. The centers were required to post notices that the state of California provides free or low-cost abortions and include a phone number to call. Some centers which did not want to post such notices were “pro-life (largely Christian belief-based).” The Court held the notice requirement was content-based, and thus subject to strict scrutiny. The Ninth Circuit had applied lesser scrutiny on the ground that the state was regulating “professional speech.” The Court held no such category of speech exists, and none should be created. This did not, the Court concluded, make a constitutional difference, for it then held the law unconstitutional on intermediate scrutiny grounds. The only purpose for the law was “providing low-income women with information about state-sponsored services.” The act did not sufficiently achieve this purpose, because was “wildly underinclusive,” applying only to a particular and small subset of family planning or crisis pregnancy centers, those that were pro-life. In addition, California could have informed low-income women of the option of abortion at little or no cost without burdening the pro-life centers. For example, a public information campaign could have been undertaken by California. But to “co-opt the licensed facilities to deliver its message for it” was unconstitutional.

A concurrence by Justice Kennedy for four justices noted the underlying issue of viewpoint discrimination, which was unnecessary to decide the case, but sufficiently important to note. The concurrence concluded, “The law is a paradigmatic example of the serious threat presented when government seeks to impose its own message in the place of individual speech, thought, and expression.”

Justice Breyer dissented in an opinion joined by three others. He concluded that the disclosure notice was similar to other disclosure notifications required in reproductive health care and thus constitutional.

Insert in Chapter 8 § B.7.a. at page 764:

EXPRESSIONS HAIR DESIGN V. SCHNEIDERMAN, 581 U.S. ___, 137 S. Ct. 1144 (2017) — New York law regulated differential pricing by merchants. It allowed them to discount the sales price if the customer paid with cash, but prohibited merchants from exacting a surcharge if the customer used a credit card. The Court held the law regulated speech, not just conduct, and remanded the case for a determination whether that regulation violated the Free Speech Clause.

Justice Breyer concurred in the judgment, noting that “it is often wiser not to try to distinguish between ‘speech’ and ‘conduct,’” for “virtually all government regulation affects speech,” as “[h]uman relations take place through speech.” Deciding what level of review should occur was a more profitable approach than determining the line between speech and conduct. Justice Sotomayor, joined by Justice Alito, also concurred in the judgment. She noted that the case was difficult because the breadth of the New York law had not been determined by New York courts, and suggested the question of the statute’s meaning be certified to the New York Court of Appeals for a determinative interpretation.

Insert in Chapter 8 § E.3. at page 811:

Janus v. AFSCME
585 U.S. ___, 138 S. Ct. 2448 (2018)

Justice ALITO delivered the opinion of the Court.

Under Illinois law, public employees are forced to subsidize a union, even if they choose not to join and strongly object to the positions the union takes in collective bargaining and related activities. We conclude that this arrangement violates the free speech rights of nonmembers by compelling them to subsidize private speech on matters of substantial public concern.

We upheld a similar law in Abood v. Detroit Bd. of Ed. (1977). Abood was poorly reasoned. It has led to practical problems and abuse. It is inconsistent with other First Amendment cases and has been undermined by more recent decisions. Developments since Abood was handed down have shed new light on the issue of agency fees, and no reliance interests on the part of public-sector unions are sufficient to justify the perpetuation of the free speech violations that Abood has countenanced for the past 41 years. Abood is therefore overruled.

I

A

Under the Illinois Public Labor Relations Act (IPLRA), employees of the State and its political subdivisions are permitted to unionize. If a majority of the employees in a bargaining unit vote to be represented by a union, that union is designated as the exclusive representative of all the employees. Employees in the unit are not obligated to join the union selected by their co-workers, but whether they join or not, that union is deemed to be their sole permitted representative.

Once a union is so designated, it is vested with broad authority. Only the union may negotiate with the employer on matters relating to “pay, wages, hours[,] and other conditions of employment.” And this authority extends to the negotiation of what the IPLRA calls “policy matters,” such as merit pay, the size of the work force, layoffs, privatization, promotion methods, and non-discrimination policies.

Designating a union as the employees’ exclusive representative substantially restricts the rights of individual employees.

Employees who decline to join the union are not assessed full union dues but must instead pay what is generally called an “agency fee,” which amounts to a percentage of the union dues. Under Abood, nonmembers may be charged for the portion of union dues attributable to activities that are “germane to [the union’s] duties as collective-bargaining representative,” but nonmembers may not be required to fund the union’s political and ideological projects.

Excluded from the agency-fee calculation are union expenditures “related to the election or support of any candidate for political office.”

[A] union categorizes its expenditures as chargeable or nonchargeable; this determination is then audited; the amount of the “proportionate share” is certified to the employer; and the employer automatically deducts that amount from the nonmembers’ wages. Nonmembers need not be asked, and they are not required to consent before the fees are deducted.

If nonmembers “suspect that a union has improperly put certain expenses in the [chargeable] category,” they may challenge that determination.

[U]nions charge nonmembers, not just for the cost of collective bargaining per se, but also for many other supposedly connected activities. Here, the nonmembers were told that they had to pay for “[l]obbying,” “[s]ocial and recreational activities,” “advertising,” “[m]embership meetings and conventions,” and “litigation,” as well as other unspecified “[s]ervices” that “may ultimately inure to the benefit of the members of the local bargaining unit.” The total chargeable amount for nonmembers was 78.06% of full union dues.

B

Petitioner Mark Janus is employed by the Illinois Department of Healthcare and Family Services. The employees in his unit are among the 35,000 public employees in Illinois who are represented by respondent American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees, Council 31 (Union). Janus refused to join the Union because he opposes “many of the public policy positions that [it] advocates,” including the positions it takes in collective bargaining.

III

Abood upheld the constitutionality of an agency-shop arrangement like the one now before us, but in more recent cases we have recognized that this holding is “something of an anomaly” and that Abood’s “analysis is questionable on several grounds.”

A

[M]ost of our free speech cases have involved restrictions on what can be said, rather than laws compelling speech. But measures compelling speech are at least as threatening.

Free speech serves many ends. It is essential to our democratic form of government, and it furthers the search for truth. Whenever the Federal Government or a State prevents individuals from saying what they think on important matters or compels them to voice ideas with which they disagree, it undermines these ends.

When speech is compelled, however, additional damage is done. In that situation, individuals are coerced into betraying their convictions. Forcing free and independent individuals to endorse ideas they find objectionable is always demeaning, and for this reason, one of our landmark free speech cases said that a law commanding “involuntary affirmation” of objected-to beliefs would require “even more immediate and urgent grounds” than a law demanding silence.

Compelling a person to subsidize the speech of other private speakers raises similar First Amendment concerns. As [Thomas] Jefferson famously put it, “to compel a man to furnish contributions of money for the propagation of opinions which he disbelieves and abhor[s] is sinful and tyrannical.” We have therefore recognized that a “significant impingement on First Amendment rights” occurs when public employees are required to provide financial support for a union that “takes many positions during collective bargaining that have powerful political and civic consequences.”

Because the compelled subsidization of private speech seriously impinges on First Amendment rights, it cannot be casually allowed.

V

C

We readily acknowledge that “the State has interests as an employer in regulating the speech of its employees that differ significantly from those it possesses in connection with regulation of the speech of the citizenry in general.” Our analysis is consistent with that principle. The exacting scrutiny standard we apply in this case was developed in the context of commercial speech, another area where the government has traditionally enjoyed greater-than-usual power to regulate speech. It is also not disputed that the State may require that a union serve as exclusive bargaining agent for its employees — itself a significant impingement on associational freedoms that would not be tolerated in other contexts. We simply draw the line at allowing the government to go further still and require all employees to support the union irrespective of whether they share its views.

VI

For the reasons given above, we conclude that public-sector agency-shop arrangements violate the First Amendment, and Abood erred in concluding otherwise. There remains the question whether stare decisis nonetheless counsels against overruling Abood. It does not.

Our cases identify factors that should be taken into account in deciding whether to overrule a past decision. Five of these are most important here: the quality of Abood’s reasoning, the workability of the rule it established, its consistency with other related decisions, developments since the decision was handed down, and reliance on the decision. After analyzing these factors, we conclude that stare decisis does not require us to retain Abood.

A

An important factor in determining whether a precedent should be overruled is the quality of its reasoning.

Abood went wrong at the start when it concluded that two prior decisions, “appear[ed] to require validation of the agency-shop agreement before [the Court].” Properly understood, those decisions did no such thing. Abood failed to appreciate that a very different First Amendment question arises when a State requires its employees to pay agency fees.

Abood’s unwarranted reliance on [precedent] appears to have contributed to another mistake: Abood judged the constitutionality of public-sector agency fees under a deferential standard that finds no support in our free speech cases.

Abood also did not sufficiently take into account the difference between the effects of agency fees in public- and private-sector collective bargaining. The challengers in Abood argued that collective bargaining with a government employer, unlike collective bargaining in the private sector, involves “inherently ‘political’” speech. But the Abood Court asserted that public employees do not have “weightier First Amendment interest[s]” against compelled speech than do private employees. That missed the point. “In the public sector, core issues such as wages, pensions, and benefits are important political issues, but that is generally not so in the private sector.”

B

Another relevant consideration in the stare decisis calculus is the workability of the precedent in question, and that factor also weighs against Abood.

1

Abood’s line between chargeable and nonchargeable union expenditures has proved to be impossible to draw with precision.

Respondents agree that Abood’s chargeable-nonchargeable line suffers from “a vagueness problem.” They therefore argue that we should “consider revisiting” this part of Abood. This concession only underscores the reality that Abood has proved unworkable: Not even the parties defending agency fees support the line that it has taken this Court over 40 years to draw.

2

Objecting employees also face a daunting and expensive task if they wish to challenge union chargeability determinations.

How could any nonmember determine whether these numbers are even close to the mark without launching a legal challenge and retaining the services of attorneys and accountants? Indeed, even with such services, it would be a laborious and difficult task to check these figures.

The Union respondent argues that challenging its chargeability determinations is not burdensome because the Union pays for the costs of arbitration, but objectors must still pay for the attorneys and experts needed to mount a serious challenge. And the attorney's fees incurred in such a proceeding can be substantial. The Union respondent's suggestion that an objector could obtain adequate review without even showing up at an arbitration is therefore farfetched.

C

Developments since Abood, both factual and legal, have also “eroded” the decision's “underpinnings” and left it an outlier among our First Amendment cases.

1

Abood pinned its result on the “unsupported empirical assumption” that “the principle of exclusive representation in the public sector is dependent on a union or agency shop.” But experience has shown otherwise.

It is also significant that the Court decided Abood against a very different legal and economic backdrop. Public-sector unionism was a relatively new phenomenon in 1977. The first State to permit collective bargaining by government employees was Wisconsin in 1959, and public-sector union membership remained relatively low until a “spurt” in the late 1960's and early 1970's.

This ascendance of public-sector unions has been marked by a parallel increase in public spending. Not all that increase can be attributed to public-sector unions, of course, but the mounting costs of public-employee wages, benefits, and pensions undoubtedly played a substantial role. These developments have given collective-bargaining issues a political valence that Abood did not fully appreciate.

2

Abood is also an “anomaly” in our First Amendment jurisprudence. Our later cases involving compelled speech and association have also employed exacting scrutiny, if not a more demanding standard.

Abood particularly sticks out when viewed against our cases holding that public employees generally may not be required to support a political party. It is an odd feature of our First Amendment cases that political patronage has been deemed largely unconstitutional, while forced subsidization of union speech (which has no such pedigree) has been largely permitted. By overruling Abood, we end the oddity of privileging compelled union support over compelled party support and bring a measure of greater coherence to our First Amendment law.

D

In some cases, reliance provides a strong reason for adhering to established law. In this case, however, reliance does not carry decisive weight.

For one thing, it would be unconscionable to permit free speech rights to be abridged in perpetuity in order to preserve contract provisions that will expire on their own in a few years' time.

For another, Abood does not provide “a clear or easily applicable standard, so arguments for reliance based on its clarity are misplaced.”

This is especially so because public-sector unions have been on notice for years regarding this Court’s misgivings about Abood.

[T]he uncertain status of Abood, the lack of clarity it provides, the short-term nature of collective-bargaining agreements, and the ability of unions to protect themselves if an agency-fee provision was crucial to its bargain all work to undermine the force of reliance as a factor supporting Abood.

All these reasons — that Abood’s proponents have abandoned its reasoning, that the precedent has proved unworkable, that it conflicts with other First Amendment decisions, and that subsequent developments have eroded its underpinnings — provide the “special justification[s]” for overruling Abood.

VII

For these reasons, States and public-sector unions may no longer extract agency fees from nonconsenting employees.

Justice KAGAN, with whom Justice GINSBURG, Justice BREYER, and Justice SOTOMAYOR join, dissenting.

For over 40 years, Abood struck a stable balance between public employees' First Amendment rights and government entities' interests in running their workforces as they thought proper.

That holding fit comfortably with this Court’s general framework for evaluating claims that a condition of public employment violates the First Amendment. The Court’s decisions have long made plain that government entities have substantial latitude to regulate their employees’ speech — especially about terms of employment — in the interest of operating their workplaces effectively. Abood allowed governments to do just that. While protecting public employees’ expression about non-workplace matters, the decision enabled a government to advance important managerial interests — by ensuring the presence of an exclusive employee representative to bargain with. Far from an “anomaly,” the Abood regime was a paradigmatic example of how the government can regulate speech in its capacity as an employer.

Not any longer. [The] decision will have large-scale consequences. Public employee unions will lose a secure source of financial support. State and local governments that thought fair-share provisions furthered their interests will need to find new ways of managing their workforces. Across the country, the relationships of public employees and employers will alter in both predictable and wholly unexpected ways.

Rarely if ever has the Court overruled a decision — let alone one of this import — with so little regard for the usual principles of stare decisis. There are no special justifications for reversing Abood. It has proved workable. No recent developments have eroded its underpinnings. And it is deeply entrenched, in both the law and the real world. More than 20 States have statutory schemes built on the decision. Reliance interests do not come any stronger than those surrounding Abood. And likewise, judicial disruption does not get any greater than what the Court does today. I respectfully dissent.

II

Unlike the majority, I see nothing “questionable” about Abood’s analysis. The decision’s account of why some government entities have a strong interest in agency fees (now often called fair-share fees) is fundamentally sound. And the balance Abood struck between public employers’ interests and public employees’ expression is right at home in First Amendment doctrine.

A

Abood’s reasoning about governmental interests has three connected parts. First, exclusive representation arrangements benefit some government entities because they can facilitate stable labor relations. Second, the government may be unable to avail itself of those benefits unless the single union has a secure source of funding. And third, agency fees are often needed to ensure such stable funding. That is because without those fees, employees have every incentive to free ride on the union dues paid by others.

[T]he majority stakes everything on the third point — the conclusion that maintaining an effective system of exclusive representation often entails agency fees.

But basic economic theory shows why a government would think that agency fees are necessary for exclusive representation to work. What ties the two together, as Abood recognized, is the likelihood of free-riding when fees are absent. Remember that once a union achieves exclusive-representation status, the law compels it to fairly represent all workers in the bargaining unit, whether or not they join or contribute to the union. Because of that legal duty, the union cannot give special advantages to its own members. And that in turn creates a collective action problem of nightmarish proportions. Everyone — not just those who oppose the union, but also those who back it — has an economic incentive to withhold dues; only altruism or loyalty — as against financial self-interest — can explain why an employee would pay the union for its services. And so emerged Abood’s rule allowing fair-share agreements.

B

1

In many cases over many decades, this Court has addressed how the First Amendment applies when the government, acting not as sovereign but as employer, limits its workers’ speech. Those decisions have granted substantial latitude to the government, in recognition of its significant interests in managing its workforce so as to best serve the public. Abood fit neatly with that caselaw, in both reasoning and result. Indeed, its reversal today creates a significant anomaly — an exception, applying to union fees alone, from the usual rules governing public employees’ speech.

2

The key point about Abood is that it fit naturally with this Court’s consistent teaching about the permissibility of regulating public employees’ speech. The Court allows a government entity to regulate that expression in aid of managing its workforce to effectively provide public services. That is just what a government aims to do when it enforces a fair-share agreement. And so, the key point about today’s decision is that it creates an unjustified hole in the law, applicable to union fees alone.

III

But the worse part of today’s opinion is where the majority subverts all known principles of stare decisis.

Consider first why these principles about precedent are so important. Stare decisis — “the idea that today’s Court should stand by yesterday’s decisions” — is “a foundation stone of the rule of law.”

And Abood is not just any precedent: It is embedded in the law in a way not many decisions are. Over four decades, this Court has cited Abood favorably many times.

Ignoring our repeated validation of Abood, the majority claims it has become “an outlier among our First Amendment cases.” That claim fails most spectacularly for reasons already discussed. [T]he majority [also] suggests that Abood conflicts with “our political patronage decisions.” But in fact those decisions strike a balance much like Abood’s.

The majority is likewise wrong to invoke “workability” as a reason for overruling Abood. Does Abood require drawing a line? Yes, between a union’s collective-bargaining activities and its political activities. Is that line perfectly and pristinely “precis[e],” as the majority demands?

Well, not quite that — but as exercises of constitutional linedrawing go, Abood stands well above average. In the 40 years since Abood, this Court has had to resolve only a handful of cases raising questions about the distinction. And that tranquility is unsurprising: There may be some gray areas (there always are), but in the mine run of cases, everyone knows the difference between politicking and collective bargaining.

And in any event, one stare decisis factor — reliance — dominates all others here and demands keeping Abood. Stare decisis, this Court has held, “has added force when the legislature, in the public sphere, and citizens, in the private realm, have acted in reliance on a previous decision.” That is because overruling a decision would then “require an extensive legislative response” or “dislodge settled rights and expectations.” Both will happen here.

Over 20 States have by now enacted statutes authorizing fair-share provisions. Every one of them will now need to come up with new ways — elaborated in new statutes — to structure relations between government employers and their workers.

Still more, thousands of current contracts covering millions of workers provide for agency fees. The majority undoes bargains reached all over the country. It prevents the parties from fulfilling other commitments they have made based on those agreements. It forces the parties — immediately — to renegotiate once-settled terms and create new tradeoffs. It does so knowing that many of the parties will have to revise (or redo) multiple contracts simultaneously. It does so with no real clue of what will happen next — of how its action will alter public-sector labor relations. It does so even though the government services affected — policing, firefighting, teaching, transportation, sanitation (and more) — affect the quality of life of tens of millions of Americans.

The majority asserts that no one should care much because the canceled agreements are “of rather short duration” and would “expire on their own in a few years’ time.” But that response ignores the substantial time and effort that state legislatures will have to devote to revamping their statutory schemes. And anyway, it misunderstands the nature of contract negotiations when the parties have a continuing relationship. The parties, in renewing an old collective-bargaining agreement, don’t start on an empty page. Instead, various “long-settled” terms — like fair-share provisions — are taken as a given.

The majority, though, offers another reason for not worrying about reliance: The parties, it says, “have been on notice for years regarding this Court’s misgivings about Abood.”

But that argument reflects a radically wrong understanding of how stare decisis operates. Abood’s holding was square. It was unabandoned before today. It was, in other words, the law — however much some were working overtime to make it not. Parties, both unions and governments, were thus justified in relying on it. To dismiss the overthrowing of their settled expectations as entailing no more than some “adjustments” and “unpleasant transition costs” is to trivialize stare decisis.

There is no sugarcoating today's opinion. The majority overthrows a decision entrenched in this Nation's law — and in its economic life — for over 40 years. As a result, it prevents the American people, acting through their state and local officials, from making important choices about workplace governance. And it does so by weaponizing the First Amendment, in a way that unleashes judges, now and in the future, to intervene in economic and regulatory policy.

The majority has overruled Abood for no exceptional or special reason, but because it never liked the decision. It has overruled Abood because it wanted to.

Because, that is, it wanted to pick the winning side in what should be — and until now, has been — an energetic policy debate. Some state and local governments (and the constituents they serve) think that stable unions promote healthy labor relations and thereby improve the provision of services to the public. Other state and local governments (and their constituents) think, to the contrary, that strong unions impose excessive costs and impair those services. Americans have debated the pros and cons for many decades — in large part, by deciding whether to use fair-share arrangements. Yesterday, 22 States were on one side, 28 on the other (ignoring a couple of in-betweeners). Today, that healthy — that democratic — debate ends.

And maybe most alarming, the majority has chosen the winners by turning the First Amendment into a sword, and using it against workaday economic and regulatory policy. Today is not the first time the Court has wielded the First Amendment in such an aggressive way. And it threatens not to be the last. Speech is everywhere — a part of every human activity (employment, health care, securities trading, you name it). For that reason, almost all economic and regulatory policy affects or touches speech. So the majority's road runs long. And at every stop are black-robed rulers overriding citizens' choices. The First Amendment was meant for better things. It was meant not to undermine but to protect democratic governance — including over the role of public-sector unions.

AFTERWORD

The Court's decision emphasizes the deleterious consequences when the government compels a person to speak, or to be associated with ideas or beliefs with which an individual may disagree. Mark Janus wanted to be free from having to pay 78.06% of the full union dues as an agency fee, for the union is the sole recognized representative of the group of employees of the state of Illinois that includes Janus. Under Abood and subsequent cases, the agency fee was the amount the union spent on activities "germane" to collective bargaining. Abood also barred the union from charging Janus and others paying the agency fee for expenditures related to political and ideological activities, considered "non-germane." Janus argued that paying the agency fee linked him to the union and thus to ideological positions with which he disagreed. That he could contest expenditures he believed "non-germane" to collective bargaining under Abood, Janus claimed, was insufficient as a matter of First Amendment law.

The Court holds the agency fee arrangement is a “compelled subsidization of private speech [which] seriously impinges on First Amendment rights.” Under a type of “exacting scrutiny” analogized to the commercial speech test, the Court holds that the requirement that public employees be required “to support the union irrespective of whether they share its views” is unconstitutional.

Abood held otherwise. Thus, the Court must overrule Abood, and it explains in § VI why stare decisis does not bar such action.

The dissent by Justice Kagan for four members of the Court, makes several claims in support of maintaining the Abood rule: Abood sensibly analyzed the costs and benefits of public unions, the interests of the government in operating its workplace, and the protection of free speech interests of government employees from governmental interference; stare decisis; and representation reinforcement as different states reach differing conclusions about whether to require non-union government employees to pay an agency fee. The dissent also raises the stakes of the case, suggesting the result will lead to a rash of “large-scale consequences.”

AMERICANS FOR PROSPERITY FOUND. V. BONTA, 594 U.S. ___, 141 S. Ct. 2373 (2012) — California required charitable organizations annually to register and disclose the identities of their largest donors to solicit funds in the state. The Court, noting its decision in NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson (1958), held the California disclosure requirement unconstitutional on its face. Six members of the Court agreed with this conclusion, but divided on the standard of review. Chief Justice Roberts, writing for himself and Justices Kavanaugh and Coney Barrett, applied “exacting scrutiny,” which required the government to prove (1) “a substantial relation between the disclosure requirement and a sufficiently important governmental interest” (quoting Doe v. Reed, 561 U.S. 186, 196 (2010)), and (2) it used narrowly tailored means (“exacting scrutiny does not require that disclosure regimes be the least restrictive means of achieving their ends”) fitting the disclosure requirement to the sufficiently important governmental interest it promotes. The plurality concluded exacting scrutiny was “derived” from NAACP v. Alabama, as well as from “electoral disclosure regimes.” California’s interest in “preventing wrongdoing by charitable organizations was a substantial governmental interest. However, there existed a “dramatic mismatch” between that interest and the “disclosure regime ... implemented in service of that end.” California did not use the disclosure of major donors as an “integral part” of detecting fraud in charitable organizations; the finding of fact by the lower court was that it never used those disclosure forms to detect fraud. Thus, the law was facially overbroad, because a “substantial number of its applications are unconstitutional, judged in relations to the statute’s plainly legitimate sweep” (quoting United States v. Stevens, 559 U.S. 560, 473 (2010)). This “widespread burden,” absent narrow tailoring of the disclosure requirement, was unconstitutional on its face. The Court indicated that a challenger to a disclosure regime “may be required to bear this evidentiary burden where the challenged regime is narrowly tailored to an important government interest.” This suggests the burden may shift during the trial of the issue.

Justice Thomas concurred in part, for three reasons. First, he believed strict scrutiny was the proper standard of review in right of association cases. Second, he doubted the validity of overbreadth challenges. Third, and more generally, the Court lacks authority to declare a law unconstitutional in all applications. The concurring opinion by Justice Alito, joined by Justice Gorsuch, began by agreeing that exacting scrutiny “has real teeth,” and that California failed to meet that standard. Justice Alito declared, “I am not prepared at this time to hold that a single standard applies to all disclosure requirements,” but that exacting scrutiny was not the favored approach taken in prior cases.

The dissent by Justice Sotomayor, joined by Justices Breyer and Kagan, began by asserting that “typically,” plaintiffs are required to “demonstrate an actual First Amendment burden before demanding that a law be narrowly tailored to the government’s interest, never mind striking the law down in its entirety. For Justice Sotomayor, the actual risk of disclosure was a key component in understanding the breadth of the Court’s protection, so an individual’s privacy interest “depends on whether publicity will lead to reprisal.” Thus, challengers must “demonstrate that a requirement [to disclose] is likely to expose their supporters to concrete repercussions in order to establish an actual burden.” If challengers do not do so, narrowly tailoring should not apply “across the board.” The rule before the Court’s decision required the challenger to present some proof of a “reasonable possibility” of government reprisal. The challengers did not present evidence demonstrated their First Amendment rights were reasonably chilled.

Because rights to association were merely indirectly burdened by disclosure requirements, a more “flexible” version of exacting scrutiny was applicable. The Court wrongly concluded that, “no matter if the burdens on associational rights are slight, heavy, or nonexistent, disclosure regimes must always be narrowly tailored.” The dissent decided the modesty of the burden on the associational rights of the challengers necessitated only a “modest showing that the means achieves its ends.” This California did.

Insert in Chapter 9 § B at page 869:

TRUMP V. HAWAII, 585 U.S. ___, 138 S. Ct. 2392 (2018) — Plaintiffs challenged the President’s Proclamation restricting the admission of citizens of a small subset of the world’s nations. Most of the citizens of those countries were Muslims, and the Proclamation was challenged on Nonestablishment Clause grounds. The Court, noting the facial neutrality of the Proclamation and its relation to issues of national security, adopted rational basis review to assess its constitutionality. It held the Proclamation was not based solely on the purpose to harm a politically unpopular group, in part due to the Proclamation’s language speaking not of Muslims or Islam but of nations. The Proclamation was based on a “legitimate grounding in national security concerns.” It was thus constitutional under rational basis scrutiny.

The dissent by Justice Sotomayor began, “The United States of America is a Nation built upon the promise of religious liberty.” Because “a reasonable observer would conclude that the Proclamation was motivated by anti-Muslim animus,” the plaintiffs had offered sufficient proof in support of their request for an injunction. The dissent went into great detail concerning the anti-Muslim public remarks of candidate and President Trump. Those statements demonstrated “that the primary purpose of the Proclamation is to disfavor Islam and its adherents by excluding them from the country.” Further, the dissent concluded that the Proclamation was unconstitutional even when judged on rational basis review, for only anti-Muslim animus explained its issuance.

AMERICAN LEGION V. AMERICAN HUMANIST ASSN, 588 U.S. ___, 139 S. Ct. 451 (2019) — The Court held constitutional the presence and governmental maintenance of the Bladensburg Peace Cross (Cross) on public land in Maryland, rejecting a Nonestablishment Clause challenge. Justice Alito wrote an opinion for the Court in part and a plurality opinion in part. The Cross was erected in the 1920s to commemorate the lives of American soldiers from the Prince George’s County area who died in World War I. The Cross was an explicitly Christian symbol, but also symbolized more: Plain white crosses marked the graves in Europe of American soldiers, a reminder of the terrible cost of the War. Thus, viewed in its historical context, the Cross “expressed the community’s grief at the loss of the young men who perished, its thanks for their sacrifice, and its dedication to the ideals for which they fought.” In this context, removal, not its presence, would signal a hostility toward religion.

In Section II-A, joined only by a plurality, Justice Alito noted the limitations, indeed the inapplicability, of the Lemon test to historic symbols and monuments on public grounds. Although inapt in this case, the plurality did not reject Lemon as possibly applicable in other cases. Section II-B concluded for a majority that the passage of time, in the case of the Cross 94 years, “gives rise to a strong presumption of constitutionality.” Section II-D, again part of a plurality opinion, made the broad statement that “categories of monuments, symbols, and practices with a longstanding history” are constitutional.

In a brief concurring opinion, Justice Breyer concluded the evidence demonstrated “the Peace Cross poses no real threat to the values that the Establishment Clause serves.” Justice Kavanaugh’s concurring opinion sought to go further, first by discarding the Lemon test and second, by suggesting governmental practices that are not coercive, are rooted in history, treat religious people comparably to secular persons, and are permissible legislative accommodations, are constitutional. Justice Thomas concurred in the judgment because the Court “does not adequately clarify the appropriate standard for Establishment Clause cases.” Unlike the Court, he urged eliminating the Lemon test. Justice Gorsuch’s opinion concurring in the judgment concluded the plaintiff American Humanist Association lacked standing.

Justice Ginsburg, joined by Justice Sotomayor, dissented. She reiterated her view that separation was the best lens through which to assess Nonestablishment Clause cases. And separation required the government to remain neutral between religion and nonreligion. The Cross was a statement that Maryland impermissibly “elevates Christianity over other faiths.” The presence of the Cross on public land led to a presumption that Maryland “endorsed its religious content.” Though a presumption rather than a conclusion, the history of the Latin cross was such that Maryland supported religion over nonreligion and more specifically, Christianity over other religions.

Insert in Chapter 9 § C. at page 892:

OUR LADY OF GUADALUPE SCHOOL V. MORRISSEY-BERRU, 591 U.S. ___, 2020 WL 3808420 (2020) — The Court, in a 7-2 opinion by Justice Alito, held the “ministerial exception” of Hosanna-Tabor applied to the claims of employment discrimination of two teachers at Roman Catholic elementary schools. The Court discussed the four indicia it listed in Hosanna-Tabor; instead of using them as a “checklist” or as a “rigid test,” the Court concluded, “What matters, at bottom, is what an employee does.” In each of these cases, it concluded, both teachers “performed vital religious duties.” Though they were not “called” ministers as was the teacher in Hosanna-Tabor, “their core responsibilities as teachers of religion were essentially the same.”

Justice Thomas concurred, joined by Justice Gorsuch. Justice Thomas reiterated his argument in Hosanna-Tabor that courts should defer to the good faith claims of religious organizations that the work of their employees is ministerial. This was essential for the government to avoid entangling itself in religious matters.

Justice Sotomayor, joined by Justice Ginsburg, dissented. Justice Sotomayor noted that both teachers “primarily taught secular subjects, lacked substantial religious titles, and were not even required to be Catholic.” She concluded the Court’s new approach was too deferential to the religious schools. She began by favorably citing Employment Division v. Smith, that religious bodies are subject to generally applicable laws like any other entity. When the Court “first recognized” the “judge-made” ministerial exception in Hosanna-Tabor, it generated an “extraordinarily potent” option giving religious employers “free rein to discriminate.” The Court’s decision was an outlier; indeed, its decision took the Hosanna-Tabor factors and “traded legal analysis for a rubber stamp.” The Court’s decision was both ripe for abuse and “portends grave consequences.”

Trinity Lutheran Church of Columbia v. Comer
582 U.S. ___, 137 S. Ct. 2012 (2017)

Chief Justice Roberts delivered the opinion of the Court, except as to footnote 3.

The Missouri Department of Natural Resources offers state grants to help public and private schools, nonprofit daycare centers, and other nonprofit entities purchase rubber playground surfaces made from recycled tires. Trinity Lutheran Church applied for such a grant for its preschool and daycare center and would have received one, but for the fact that Trinity Lutheran is a church. The Department had a policy of categorically disqualifying churches and other religious organizations from receiving grants under its playground resurfacing program. The question presented is whether the Department’s policy violated the rights of Trinity Lutheran under the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment.

A

The Trinity Lutheran Church Child Learning Center is a preschool and daycare center open throughout the year to serve working families in Boone County, Missouri. [T]he Center merged with Trinity Lutheran Church in 1985 and operates under its auspices on church property. The Center admits students of any religion, and enrollment stands at about 90 children ranging from age two to five.

The Center includes a playground that is equipped with the basic playground essentials. Almost the entire surface beneath and surrounding the play equipment is coarse pea gravel.

In 2012, the Center sought to replace a large portion of the pea gravel with a pour-in-place rubber surface by participating in Missouri’s Scrap Tire Program.

[T]he Department cannot offer grants to all applicants and so awards them on a competitive basis to those scoring highest based on several criteria, such as the poverty level of the population in the surrounding area and the applicant’s plan to promote recycling. When the Center applied, the Department had a strict and express policy of denying grants to any applicant owned or controlled by a church, sect, or other religious entity. That policy, in the Department’s view, was compelled by Article I, Section 7 of the Missouri Constitution.

The Center ranked fifth among the 44 applicants in the 2012 Scrap Tire Program. [T]he Center was deemed categorically ineligible to receive a grant [due to] the Missouri Constitution.

[The Center sued and lost. The Court granted certiorari, and reversed.]

II

The parties agree that the Establishment Clause does not prevent Missouri from including Trinity Lutheran in the Scrap Tire Program. That does not, however, answer the question under the Free Exercise Clause, because we have recognized that there is “play in the joints” between what the Establishment Clause permits and the Free Exercise Clause compels.

The Free Exercise Clause “protect[s] religious observers against unequal treatment” and subjects to the strictest scrutiny laws that target the religious for “special disabilities” based on their “religious status.” Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. Hialeah. Applying that basic principle, this Court has repeatedly confirmed that denying a generally available benefit solely on account of religious identity imposes a penalty on the free exercise of religion that can be justified only by a state interest “of the highest order.”

In Everson v. Board of Education, for example, we upheld against an Establishment Clause challenge a New Jersey law enabling a local school district to reimburse parents for the public transportation costs of sending their children to public and private schools, including parochial schools. [W]e explained that a State “cannot hamper its citizens in the free exercise of their own religion. Consequently, it cannot exclude individual Catholics, Lutherans, Mohammedans, Baptists, Jews, Methodists, Non-believers, Presbyterians, or the members of any other faith, because of their faith, or lack of it, from receiving the benefits of public welfare legislation.”

Three decades later, in McDaniel v. Paty, the Court struck down under the Free Exercise Clause a Tennessee statute disqualifying ministers from serving as delegates to the State’s constitutional convention. Writing for the plurality, Chief Justice Burger acknowledged that Tennessee had disqualified ministers from serving as legislators since the adoption of its first Constitution in 1796, and that a number of early States had also disqualified ministers from legislative office. This historical tradition, however, did not change the fact that the statute discriminated against McDaniel by denying him a benefit solely because of his “status as a ‘minister.’” McDaniel could not seek to participate in the convention while also maintaining his role as a minister; to pursue the one, he would have to give up the other.

In recent years, when this Court has rejected free exercise challenges, the laws in question have been neutral and generally applicable without regard to religion. We have been careful to distinguish such laws from those that single out the religious for disfavored treatment.

In Employment Division v. Smith, we rejected a free exercise claim brought by two members of a Native American church denied unemployment benefits because they had violated Oregon’s drug laws by ingesting peyote for sacramental purposes. [W]e held that the Free Exercise Clause did not entitle the church members to a special dispensation from the general criminal laws on account of their religion. At the same time, we again made clear that the Free Exercise Clause did guard against the government’s imposition of “special disabilities on the basis of religious views or religious status.”

Finally, in Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye, we struck down three facially neutral city ordinances that outlawed certain forms of animal slaughter.

III

A

The Department’s policy expressly discriminates against otherwise eligible recipients by disqualifying them from a public benefit solely because of their religious character. If the cases just described make one thing clear, it is that such a policy imposes a penalty on the free exercise of religion that triggers the most exacting scrutiny. This conclusion is unremarkable in light of our prior decisions.

Like the disqualification statute in McDaniel, the Department’s policy puts Trinity Lutheran to a choice: It may participate in an otherwise available benefit program or remain a religious institution. Of course, Trinity Lutheran is free to continue operating as a church, just as McDaniel was free to continue being a minister. But that freedom comes at the cost of automatic and absolute exclusion from the benefits of a public program for which the Center is otherwise fully qualified. And when the State conditions a benefit in this way, McDaniel says plainly that the State has punished the free exercise of religion.

The Department contends that merely declining to extend funds to Trinity Lutheran does not prohibit the Church from engaging in any religious conduct or otherwise exercising its religious rights. In this sense, says the Department, its policy is unlike the ordinances struck down in Lukumi. Here the Department has simply declined to allocate to Trinity Lutheran a subsidy the State had no obligation to provide in the first place.

It is true the Department has not criminalized the way Trinity Lutheran worships or told the Church that it cannot subscribe to a certain view of the Gospel. But, as the Department itself acknowledges, the Free Exercise Clause protects against “indirect coercion or penalties on the free exercise of religion, not just outright prohibitions.” As the Court put it more than 50 years ago, “[i]t is too late in the day to doubt that the liberties of religion and expression may be infringed by the denial of or placing of conditions upon a benefit or privilege.” Sherbert.

Trinity Lutheran is not claiming any entitlement to a subsidy. It instead asserts a right to participate in a government benefit program without having to disavow its religious character. The “imposition of such a condition upon even a gratuitous benefit inevitably deter[s] or discourage[s] the exercise of First Amendment rights.” Sherbert. The express discrimination against religious exercise here is not the denial of a grant, but rather the refusal to allow the Church — solely because it is a church — to compete with secular organizations for a grant. Trinity Lutheran is a member of the community too, and the State’s decision to exclude it for purposes of this public program must withstand the strictest scrutiny.

B

The Department attempts to get out from under the weight of our precedents by arguing that the free exercise question in this case is instead controlled by our decision in Locke v. Davey. It is not. In Locke, the State of Washington created a scholarship program to assist high-achieving students with the costs of postsecondary education. The scholarships were paid out of the State’s general fund, and eligibility was based on criteria such as an applicant’s score on college admission tests and family income. While scholarship recipients were free to use the money at accredited religious and non-religious schools alike, they were not permitted to use the funds to pursue a devotional theology degree — one “devotional in nature or designed to induce religious faith.” Davey was selected for a scholarship but was denied the funds when he refused to certify that he would not use them toward a devotional degree. He sued, arguing that the State’s refusal to allow its scholarship money to go toward such degrees violated his free exercise rights.

This Court disagreed. It began by explaining what was not at issue. Washington’s selective funding program was not comparable to the free exercise violations found in the “Lukumi line of cases,” including those striking down laws requiring individuals to “choose between their religious beliefs and receiving a government benefit.” At the outset, then, the Court made clear that Locke was not like the case now before us.

Washington's restriction on the use of its scholarship funds was different. According to the Court, the State had "merely chosen not to fund a distinct category of instruction." Davey was not denied a scholarship because of who he was; he was denied a scholarship because of what he proposed to do — use the funds to prepare for the ministry. Here there is no question that Trinity Lutheran was denied a grant simply because of what it is — a church.

The Court in Locke also stated that Washington's choice was in keeping with the State's antiestablishment interest in not using taxpayer funds to pay for the training of clergy; in fact, the Court could "think of few areas in which a State's antiestablishment interests come more into play." Here nothing of the sort can be said about a program to use recycled tires to resurface playgrounds.

Relying on Locke, the Department nonetheless emphasizes Missouri's similar constitutional tradition of not furnishing taxpayer money directly to churches. But Locke took account of Washington's antiestablishment interest only after determining, as noted, that the scholarship program did not "require students to choose between their religious beliefs and receiving a government benefit." As the Court put it, Washington's scholarship program went "a long way toward including religion in its benefits." Students in the program were free to use their scholarships at "pervasively religious schools." Davey could use his scholarship to pursue a secular degree at one institution while studying devotional theology at another. He could also use his scholarship money to attend a religious college and take devotional theology courses there. The only thing he could not do was use the scholarship to pursue a degree in that subject.

In this case, there is no dispute that Trinity Lutheran is put to the choice between being a church and receiving a government benefit. The rule is simple: No churches need apply.³

C

The State in this case expressly requires Trinity Lutheran to renounce its religious character in order to participate in an otherwise generally available public benefit program, for which it is fully qualified. Our cases make clear that such a condition imposes a penalty on the free exercise of religion that must be subjected to the "most rigorous" scrutiny.

The State has pursued its preferred policy to the point of expressly denying a qualified religious entity a public benefit solely because of its religious character. Under our precedents, that goes too far. The Department's policy violates the Free Exercise Clause.

The Missouri Department of Natural Resources has not subjected anyone to chains or torture on account of religion. And the result of the State's policy is nothing so dramatic as the denial of political office. The consequence is, in all likelihood, a few extra scraped knees. But the exclusion of Trinity Lutheran from a public benefit for which it is otherwise qualified, solely because it is a church, is odious to our Constitution all the same, and cannot stand.

³ This case involves express discrimination based on religious identity with respect to playground resurfacing. We do not address religious uses of funding or other forms of discrimination.

Justice GORSUCH, with whom Justice THOMAS joins, concurring in part.

Missouri’s law bars Trinity Lutheran from participating in a public benefits program only because it is a church. I agree this violates the First Amendment. I offer only two modest qualifications.

First, the Court leaves open the possibility a useful distinction might be drawn between laws that discriminate on the basis of religious status and religious use. Respectfully, I harbor doubts about the stability of such a line. Does a religious man say grace before dinner? Or does a man begin his meal in a religious manner? Is it a religious group that built the playground? Or did a group build the playground so it might be used to advance a religious mission? The distinction blurs in much the same way the line between acts and omissions can blur when stared at too long, leaving us to ask (for example) whether the man who drowns by awaiting the incoming tide does so by act (coming upon the sea) or omission (allowing the sea to come upon him). Often enough the same facts can be described both ways.

Neither do I see why the First Amendment’s Free Exercise Clause should care. After all, that Clause guarantees the free exercise of religion, not just the right to inward belief (or status). Smith. And this Court has long explained that government may not “devise mechanisms, overt or disguised, designed to persecute or oppress a religion or its practices.” Lukumi. Generally the government may not force people to choose between participation in a public program and their right to free exercise of religion. I don’t see why it should matter whether we describe that benefit, say, as closed to Lutherans (status) or closed to people who do Lutheran things (use). It is free exercise either way.

For these reasons, reliance on the status-use distinction does not suffice for me to distinguish Locke v. Davey.

Second and for similar reasons, I am unable to join [footnote 3.] Of course the footnote is entirely correct, but I worry that some might mistakenly read it to suggest that only “playground resurfacing” cases, or only those with some association with children’s safety or health, or perhaps some other social good we find sufficiently worthy, are governed by the legal rules recounted in and faithfully applied by the Court’s opinion. Such a reading would be unreasonable for our cases are “governed by general principles, rather than ad hoc improvisations.” And the general principles here do not permit discrimination against religious exercise — whether on the playground or anywhere else.

Justice BREYER, concurring in the judgment.

I agree with much of what the Court says and with its result. But I find relevant, and would emphasize, the particular nature of the “public benefit” here at issue.

The Court stated in Everson that “cutting off church schools from” such “general government services as ordinary police and fire protection . . . is obviously not the purpose of the First Amendment.” Here, the State would cut Trinity Lutheran off from participation in a general program designed to secure or to improve the health and safety of children. I see no significant difference. The fact that the program at issue ultimately funds only a limited number of projects cannot itself justify a religious distinction. Nor is there any administrative or other reason to treat church schools differently. The sole reason advanced that explains the difference is faith. And it is that last mentioned fact that calls the Free Exercise Clause into play. I would leave the application of the Free Exercise Clause to other kinds of public benefits for another day.

Justice SOTOMAYOR, with whom Justice GINSBURG joins, dissenting.

This case is about nothing less than the relationship between religious institutions and the civil government — that is, between church and state. The Court today profoundly changes that relationship by holding, for the first time, that the Constitution requires the government to provide public funds directly to a church. Its decision slights both our precedents and our history, and its reasoning weakens this country’s longstanding commitment to a separation of church and state beneficial to both.

II

[T]his is a case about whether Missouri can decline to fund improvements to the facilities the Church uses to practice and spread its religious views. This Court has repeatedly warned that funding of exactly this kind — payments from the government to a house of worship — would cross the line drawn by the Establishment Clause. The Establishment Clause does not allow Missouri to grant the Church’s funding request because the Church uses the Learning Center, including its playground, in conjunction with its religious mission.

A

The government may not directly fund religious exercise. See Everson. Put in doctrinal terms, such funding violates the Establishment Clause because it impermissibly “advanc[es] . . . religion.”

Nowhere is this rule more clearly implicated than when funds flow directly from the public treasury to a house of worship. A house of worship exists to foster and further religious exercise. When a government funds a house of worship, it underwrites this religious exercise.

The Church seeks state funds to improve the Learning Center’s facilities, which, by the Church’s own avowed description, are used to assist the spiritual growth of the children of its members and to spread the Church’s faith to the children of nonmembers. The Church’s playground surface — like a Sunday School room’s walls or the sanctuary’s pews — are integrated with and integral to its religious mission.

True, this Court has found some direct government funding of religious institutions to be consistent with the Establishment Clause. But the funding in those cases came with assurances that public funds would not be used for religious activity. The Church has not and cannot provide such assurances here. The Church has a religious mission, one that it pursues through the Learning Center. The playground surface cannot be confined to secular use any more than lumber used to frame the Church's walls, glass stained and used to form its windows, or nails used to build its altar.

B

When the Court last addressed direct funding of religious institutions, in Mitchell [v. Helms], it adhered to the rule that the Establishment Clause prohibits the direct funding of religious activities. At issue was a federal program that helped state and local agencies lend educational materials to public and private schools, including religious schools. The controlling concurrence [by Justice O'Connor] assured itself that the program would not lead to the public funding of religious activity.

Today's opinion suggests the Court has made the leap the Mitchell plurality could not. For if it agrees that the funding here will finance religious activities, then only a rule that considers that fact irrelevant could support a conclusion of constitutionality. It has no basis in the history to which the Court has repeatedly turned to inform its understanding of the Establishment Clause. It permits direct subsidies for religious indoctrination, with all the attendant concerns that led to the Establishment Clause. And it favors certain religious groups, those with a belief system that allows them to compete for public dollars and those well-organized and well-funded enough to do so successfully.

III

Even assuming the absence of an Establishment Clause violation and proceeding on the Court's preferred front — the Free Exercise Clause — the Court errs. It claims that the government may not draw lines based on an entity's religious "status." But we have repeatedly said that it can.

A

The Establishment Clause prohibits laws "respecting an establishment of religion" and the Free Exercise Clause prohibits laws "prohibiting the free exercise thereof." "[I]f expanded to a logical extreme," these prohibitions "would tend to clash with the other." Walz. Even in the absence of a violation of one of the Religion Clauses, the interaction of government and religion can raise concerns that sound in both Clauses. For that reason, the government may sometimes act to accommodate those concerns, even when not required to do so by the Free Exercise Clause, without violating the Establishment Clause. And the government may sometimes act to accommodate those concerns, even when not required to do so by the Establishment Clause, without violating the Free Exercise Clause. "[T]here is room for play in the joints productive of a benevolent neutrality which will permit religious exercise to exist without sponsorship and without interference.” Id. This space between the two Clauses gives government some room to recognize the unique status of religious entities and to single them out on that basis for exclusion from otherwise generally applicable laws.

Invoking this principle, this Court has held that the government may sometimes relieve religious entities from the requirements of government programs. A State need not, for example, require nonprofit houses of worship to pay property taxes. Nor must a State require nonprofit religious entities to abstain from making employment decisions on the basis of religion. But the government may not invoke the space between the Religion Clauses in a manner that “devolve[s] into an unlawful fostering of religion.” Cutter v. Wilkinson.

[T]his Court has held that the government may sometimes close off certain government aid programs to religious entities. The State need not, for example, fund the training of a religious group’s leaders. It may instead avoid the historic “antiestablishment interests” raised by the use of “taxpayer funds to support church leaders.” Locke.

B

Missouri has decided that the unique status of houses of worship requires a special rule when it comes to public funds.

Missouri’s decision, which has deep roots in our Nation’s history, reflects a reasonable and constitutional judgment.

1

This Court has consistently looked to history for guidance when applying the Constitution’s Religion Clauses. This case is no different.

This Nation’s early experience with, and eventual rejection of, established religion — defies easy summary.

Despite this rich diversity of experience, the story relevant here is one of consistency. The use of public funds to support core religious institutions can safely be described as a hallmark of the States’ early experiences with religious establishment. Every state establishment saw laws passed to raise public funds and direct them toward houses of worship and ministers. And as the States all disestablished, one by one, they all undid those laws.

Those who fought to end the public funding of religion based their opposition on a powerful set of arguments, all stemming from the basic premise that the practice harmed both civil government and religion. The civil government, they maintained, could claim no authority over religious belief. For them, support for religion compelled by the State marked an overstep of authority that would only lead to more. Equally troubling, it risked divisiveness by giving religions reason to compete for the State’s beneficence. Faith, they believed, was a personal matter, entirely between an individual and his god. Religion was best served when sects reached out on the basis of their tenets alone, unsullied by outside forces, allowing adherents to come to their faith voluntarily. Over and over, these arguments gained acceptance and led to the end of state laws exacting payment for the support of religion.

[The dissent then discusses the history of disestablishment in Virginia, Maryland, and New England.]

The course of this history shows that those who lived under the laws and practices that formed religious establishments made a considered decision that civil government should not fund ministers and their houses of worship.

2

Like the use of public dollars for ministers at issue in Locke, turning over public funds to houses of worship implicates serious antiestablishment and free exercise interests. The history just discussed fully supports this conclusion. As states disestablished, they repealed laws allowing taxation to support religion because the practice threatened other forms of government support for, involved some government control over, and weakened supporters' control of religion. A state can reasonably use status as a "house of worship" as a stand-in for "religious activities." Inside a house of worship, dividing the religious from the secular would require intrusive line-drawing by government, and monitoring those lines would entangle government with the house of worship's activities. And so while not every activity a house of worship undertakes will be inseparably linked to religious activity, "the likelihood that many are makes a categorical rule a suitable means to avoid chilling the exercise of religion." Finally, and of course, such funding implicates the free exercise rights of taxpayers by denying them the chance to decide for themselves whether and how to fund religion. If there is any "room for play in the joints" between the Religion Clauses, it is here. Locke.

As was true in Locke, a prophylactic rule against the use of public funds for houses of worship is a permissible accommodation of these weighty interests. The rule has a historical pedigree identical to that of the provision in Locke. Almost all of the States that ratified the Religion Clauses operated under this rule. Today, thirty-eight States have a counterpart to Missouri's Article I, § 7. The provisions, as a general matter, date back to or before these States' original Constitutions. That so many States have for so long drawn a line that prohibits public funding for houses of worship, based on principles rooted in this Nation's understanding of how best to foster religious liberty, supports the conclusion that public funding of houses of worship "is of a different ilk." Locke.

Missouri has recognized the simple truth that, even absent an Establishment Clause violation, the transfer of public funds to houses of worship raises concerns that sit exactly between the Religion Clauses. To avoid those concerns, and only those concerns, it has prohibited such funding. In doing so, it made the same choice made by the earliest States centuries ago and many other States in the years since. The Constitution permits this choice.

In the Court's view, none of this matters. The Court describes this as a constitutionally impermissible line based on religious "status" that requires strict scrutiny. Its rule is out of step with our precedents in this area, and wrong on its own terms.

The Constitution creates specific rules that control how the government may interact with religious entities. And so of course a government may act based on a religious entity's "status" as such. It is that very status that implicates the interests protected by the Religion Clauses. Sometimes a religious entity's unique status requires the government to act. Hosanna-Tabor. Other times, it merely permits the government to act.

Start where the Court stays silent. Its opinion does not acknowledge that our precedents have expressly approved of a government's choice to draw lines based on an entity's religious status. Those cases did not deploy strict scrutiny to create a presumption of unconstitutionality, as the Court does today. Instead, they asked whether the government had offered a strong enough reason to justify drawing a line based on that status.

The Court takes two steps to avoid these precedents. First, it recasts Locke as a case about a restriction that prohibited the would-be minister from "us[ing] the funds to prepare for the ministry." A faithful reading of Locke gives it a broader reach. Locke stands for the reasonable proposition that the government may, but need not, choose not to fund certain religious entities (there, ministers) where doing so raises "historic and substantial" establishment and free exercise concerns. Second, it suggests that this case is different because it involves "discrimination" in the form of the denial of access to a possible benefit. But in this area of law, a decision to treat entities differently based on distinctions that the Religion Clauses make relevant does not amount to discrimination. To understand why, keep in mind that "the Court has unambiguously concluded that the individual freedom of conscience protected by the First Amendment embraces the right to select any religious faith or none at all." Wallace v. Jaffree. If the denial of a benefit others may receive is discrimination that violates the Free Exercise Clause, then the accommodations of religious entities we have approved would violate the free exercise rights of nonreligious entities. We have, with good reason, rejected that idea, and instead focused on whether the government has provided a good enough reason, based in the values the Religion Clauses protect, for its decision.

The Court offers no real reason for rejecting the balancing approach in our precedents in favor of strict scrutiny, beyond its references to discrimination. A State's decision not to fund houses of worship does not disfavor religion; rather, it represents a valid choice to remain secular in the face of serious establishment and free exercise concerns. That does not make the State "atheistic or antireligious." It means only that the State has "establishe[d] neither atheism nor religion as its official creed."

At bottom, the Court creates the following rule today: The government may draw lines on the basis of religious status to grant a benefit to religious persons or entities but it may not draw lines on that basis when doing so would further the interests the Religion Clauses protect in other ways. Nothing supports this lopsided outcome. Not the Religion Clauses. Not precedent. And not reason.

Today's decision discounts centuries of history and jeopardizes the government's ability to remain secular. Just three years ago, this Court claimed to understand that. It makes clear today that this principle applies only when preference suits.

IV

The Court today dismantles a core protection for religious freedom provided in these Clauses. History shows that the Religion Clauses separate the public treasury from religious coffers as one measure to secure the kind of freedom of conscience that benefits both religion and government. If this separation means anything, it means that the government cannot, or at the very least need not, tax its citizens and turn that money over to houses of worship. The Court today blinds itself to the outcome this history requires and leads us instead to a place where separation of church and state is a constitutional slogan, not a constitutional commitment. I dissent.

AFTERWORD

The Court categorizes Missouri's action as singling out "churches and other religious organizations" for disparate and thus discriminatory treatment. By stating the issue in those terms, the case raises Free Exercise concerns. And when a state engages in religious discrimination, strict scrutiny is the constitutional standard of review. The precedential hurdle for the Court is Locke v. Davey. In Locke, the state constitutional provision was similar to the provision at issue in this case. Both excluded religious organizations from receiving state funds for reasons of the state's Nonestablishment Clause. The difference was that the Court held Davey's Free Exercise claim failed. Locke is distinguished from Trinity Lutheran's claim, suggests Chief Justice Roberts's opinion for the Court, because Locke was not like other religious discrimination cases (Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye and McDaniel v. Paty and Sherbert v. Verner). It was different because the law challenged in Locke did not require a person to "choose between their religious beliefs and receiving a government benefit." Instead, narrowing the level of generality, Locke merely concerned a state's decision "not to fund a distinct category of instruction." The majority concludes that the Missouri constitution violates the Free Exercise Clause. It also holds that the federal Nonestablishment Clause does not require Missouri or other states to distinguish among those who receive funds based on secular criteria.

Justice Gorsuch's opinion concurring in part notes the difficulty in distinguishing between status and use. One might be a Hindu, or one might be a person who engages in Hindu religious practices. The Court's distinction of Trinity Lutheran's case (discrimination based on the status of being a religious organization is unconstitutional) from Joshua Davey's case (discrimination on the basis that Davey wishes to use the scholarship funds to pursue a degree in devotional theology) is thus unhelpful to him.

The dissent by Justice Sotomayor is premised on a very different view of the Religion Clause, one hearkening back to the Court's "separation of church and state" standard largely created in Everson in 1947 and abandoned by 1970 in Walz v. Tax Commission and in 1971 by Lemon v. Kurtzman. The wall of separation metaphor frames issues initially in light of the Nonestablishment Clause. Only if a law passes muster under that Clause will the Court turn to Free Exercise claims. Thus, Justice Sotomayor frames the issue as government refusing directly to fund Trinity Lutheran's religious exercise. Because the playground is used by a religious organization as part of its evangelization, or as a demonstration of living out its religious faith, any funds given to the Learning Center for improving safety in the playground is a direct funding of religious activity. That is why the Nonestablishment Clause should justify the state's refusal to award any funds to Trinity Lutheran (see § II). In II of the dissent, Justice Sotomayor begins by declaring the Establishment and Free Exercise Clauses, if expanded to a logical extreme, would tend to clash (quoting Walz). The Court argued about this seeming paradox in the 1960s and 1970s. Justice Stewart declared that such a conclusion was itself illogical, for it suggested the Framers drafted a Constitution that conflicted with itself. Instead, Justice Stewart believed, the Court's interpretations of the two Clauses were to source of the problem, not the provisions themselves. Justice Sotomayor's dissent argues that, based on history, the state may deny benefits to religious institutions which are available to similar non-religious institutions, as part of the "play in the joints" of the Free Exercise and Nonestablishment Clauses. This historical argument raises the stakes, suggesting that the Court is headed down a dangerously incorrect path. The play in the joints argument also analogizes this case to Locke. The possible dangers to liberty if religions can take aid from the state to evangelize allows states to create a "prophylactic rule" limiting who may receive state aid. This rule "is a permissible accommodation of" the interests in protecting against a merger of church and state. The dissent also attacks the Court's status/action distinction, concluding that some forms of religious "status" may be used to draw lines protecting both Free Exercise and Nonestablishment Clause interests. It cleverly uses the Hosanna-Tabor case as one urging caution. This is clever both because Chief Justice Roberts wrote the Court's opinion in that case, and also because Hosanna-Tabor, which broadly protected Free Exercise, is used to promote Nonestablishment Clause interests instead of Free Exercise interests.

The Blaine Amendment was a failed constitutional amendment first proposed by Representative James G. Blaine in 1875. In part it declared that "no money raised by taxation in any State for the support of public schools ... shall ever be under the control of any religious sect." The Blaine Amendment was part of an anti-Roman Catholic effort that began in the 1840s and continued through much of the remainder of the nineteenth century. In common or public schools in the 1840s and 1850s, the Protestant King James Bible was used to aid in reading comprehension and general knowledge. Catholics objected to the use of that Bible. Their arguments that Catholic students should be permitted to read from the Catholic Bible rather than the King James Bible were rejected. Catholics then created their own schools in major cities such as New York, Philadelphia, and Boston, and later, throughout the nation.

Though the Blaine Amendment failed in the Senate, it was introduced each session of Congress through 1907, and after 1876, Congress required all territories entering the Union as states to include language requiring the state to maintain public schools free from sectarian control and not to aid any church directly or indirectly. Thus, no Catholic school could ever be categorized as a public school and receive state funds. But public schools would continue to use the King James Bible as a reader. This Blaine Amendment provision was part of Washington's Constitution and the subject of Locke. Missouri entered the Union well before this time, but its Article I, § 7 required "That no money shall ever be taken from the public treasury, directly or indirectly, in aid of any church, sect or denomination of religion." That language is quite similar to Blaine Amendment language. The history of discrimination against Roman Catholics, who operated their own schools, is part of the puzzle of understanding both the Nonestablishment and Free Exercise Clauses. The dissent does not, however, mention this history in discussing the foundations of Nonestablishment Clause doctrine.

MASTERPIECE CAKESHOP, LTD. V. COLORADO CIVIL RIGHTS COMM'N, 584 U.S. ___, 137 S. Ct. 2290 (2018) — In 2012 a gay couple asked Jack Phillips, the owner of Masterpiece Cakeshop in Colorado, to bake them a wedding cake. Phillips refused to do so because he believed creating it "would be equivalent to participating in a celebration that is contrary to his own most deeply held [religious] beliefs." Phillips offered to bake other types of cakes, but "I just don't make cakes for same sex weddings." The couple filed a complaint against Phillips for violating Colorado law banning discrimination in public accommodations. The Colorado Civil Rights Commission affirmed the decision by an administrative law judge that Phillips had violated the anti-discrimination law. That decision was affirmed by the Colorado Court of Appeals. The Supreme Court reversed, in an opinion by Justice Kennedy. The Court noted that a balance had to be struck between ensuring that gay couples are protected in the exercise of their civil rights and in protecting the rights of religious organizations and believers "in some instances" to engage in protected forms of expression, including expression disapproving of same-sex marriage. The Court noted that in 2012 Colorado did not legally recognize "gay marriages," and the Court's decision in Obergefell requiring all states to do so was also in the future. The Court also noted that the Civil Rights Division had concluded on "at least three occasions that a baker acted lawfully in declining to create cakes with decorations that demeaned gay persons or gay marriages." Finally, it concluded that the "Commission's treatment of [Phillips's] case has some elements of a clear and impermissible hostility toward the sincere religious beliefs that motivated his objection." In particular, the Court declared that one Commissioner's statement that "Freedom of religion and religion has been used to justify all kinds of discrimination throughout history, whether it be slavery, whether it be the holocaust, . . . freedom of religion has been used to justify discrimination." Such an effort, the Commissioner stated, "is one of the most despicable pieces of rhetoric that people can use to — to use their religion to hurt others." The Court held this "sentiment is inappropriate for a Commission charged with the solemn responsibility of fair and neutral enforcement of Colorado's anti-discrimination law." This statement, as well as the differing conclusions in the other three cake message instances, in which the cake maker was permitted to refuse to make a cake for reasons of conscience, demonstrated "hostility" toward religious beliefs and viewpoints. This official hostility of the government toward Phillips's "sincere religious objections" violated the Free Exercise Clause.

Justices Kagan and Breyer concurred. The concurrence was offered to point to an approach harmonizing the decisions regarding Phillips with those three instances in which cake makers refused to make cakes with demeaning messages toward gay marriage. The Commission properly supported the cake makers in the latter cases, Justice Kagan concluded, because “the bakers did not single out [the customer] because of his religion, but instead treated him in the same way they would have treated anyone else.” In contrast, Phillips’s refusal “contravened” the anti-discrimination law because Phillips was willing to make wedding cakes for opposite-sex couples but not same-sex couples. Justice Kagan concurred in the result because, in this case, the Commission showed hostility to religion.

Justice Gorsuch also wrote a concurring opinion, specifically to rebut the concurrence of Justice Kagan and Justice Ginsburg’s dissent. Regarding the latter, Justice Gorsuch declared that concluding a constitutional difference exists between a wedding cake that includes “words” and one lacking words is an “irrational” distinction, for no one can “reasonably doubt that a wedding cake without words conveys a message.” Because those supporting and opposing the extension of marriage beyond opposite sex couples wanted bakers to make cakes that conveyed a message, the Commission owed a duty to use the same analysis for any baker who refused to make a cake with a message with which the baker disagreed. Justice Gorsuch criticized Justice Kagan’s concurring opinion, arguing it used the wrong level of generality: the case was not about wedding cakes, but wedding cakes celebrating a same sex marriage. “The problem is, the Commission didn’t play with the level of generality” in the other three instances in the same way. If, for example, the proper level of generality was “cakes,” then all the cakes should have been made. The concurrence harmonized the different cases “[o]nly by adjusting the dials just right—fine-tuning the level of generality up or down for each case based solely on the identity of the parties and the substance of their views.”

Justice Thomas also concurred in part and in the judgment. His opinion discussed the free speech claim of Phillips, which the Court avoided discussing. In his view, the conduct of Phillips in “creating and designing custom wedding cakes” is expressive, and thus subject to strict scrutiny. Though he did not attempt to assess whether the anti-discrimination law met this standard, he noted the “bedrock principle” that government may not “punish protected speech because some group finds it offensive, hurtful, stigmatic, unreasonable, or undignified.”

Justice Ginsburg’s dissent concluded that the religious hostility relied upon by the majority was not “of the kind we have previously held to signal a free-exercise violation,” and the comments of one or two members of the Commission did not suggest a kind of hostility to religion that would justify reversal. She concluded that the couple was denied a cake by Phillips “for no reason other than their sexual orientation,” for he sold such cakes to heterosexual couples. Further, the distinction between Phillips and the three other refusals was not based on the government’s view of the “offensiveness” of the messages. Instead, in the Phillips case the couple was denied service due to their identity.

AFTERWORD—It seems clear that Commissions hearing similar cases in the future will avoid putting on the record statements evincing a hostility to religion. That will eliminate the free exercise claim if the baker or other provider of services is found in violation of state or local anti-discrimination provisions. When inevitably another such case arises, the Court will have to determine how best to categorize the action possessing an expressive component. When creating a cake, arranging flowers, or engaging in some other activity that has an expressive component (that is, something analogous to nude dancing or burning a draft card or an American flag), is this activity better understood as protected free speech or expression, or as a commercial act or conduct ordinarily subject to state and local anti-discrimination laws?

The issue of the proper level of generality is often an issue in free expression and free exercise cases. How should the Court determine what level of generality is the proper constitutional level?

ESPINOZA V. MONTANA DEP'T OF REVENUE, 591 U.S. ___, 140 S. Ct. 2246 (2020) — In a 5-4 decision, the Court held unconstitutional a Montana regulatory provision prohibiting families receiving scholarship monies to use those funds to attend religiously-affiliated private schools. The Montana legislature adopted a “school choice” plan allowing its taxpayers to receive a tax credit of up to $150 for donating money to a “school scholarship organization.” When a child was awarded a school scholarship, the child’s family notified the scholarship organization (Big Sky Scholarships was the sole entity engaged in granting scholarships) and the organization sent the scholarship funds directly to the school. Montana funded the tax credits. The Montana Constitution and state law forbid direct aid (“no-aid”) to religiously-affiliated schools. In light of this law and in administering the school choice program, the Montana Department of Revenue issued Rule 1, forbidding the school scholarship organization (Big Sky) from directing any of its scholarship funds to any school “owned or controlled in whole or in part by any church, religious sect, or denomination.” Parents of schoolchildren who received scholarship funds, or who were eligible for such funds, sued, claiming Rule 1 was contrary to the school choice statute, not required by the Montana Constitution, and violative of the Free Exercise Clause. In the Supreme Court the parties agreed that the scholarship program did not violate the Nonestablishment Clause of the First Amendment. The issue was whether the no-aid provision of the state constitution and law violated the Free Exercise Clause. The Court held it did: “Montana’s no-aid provision bars religious schools from public benefits solely because of the religious character of the schools.” Because this provision “plainly excludes schools from government aid solely because of religious status,” it was unconstitutional. The Court cited Trinity Lutheran as on point. Like Trinity Lutheran, this case “turns expressly on religious status and not religious use.” And the “Montana Constitution discriminates based on religious status just like the Missouri policy in Trinity Lutheran.” The Court rejected the Department of Revenue’s argument that the benefit in Trinity Lutheran was “completely non-religious,” while the scholarship aid “could be used for religious ends by some recipients.” It did so by characterizing the Montana Supreme Court’s decision as applying the no-aid provision “solely on religious status.”

As was also the case in Trinity Lutheran, the applicability of Locke v. Davey was raised. The Court held Locke inapposite. It offered two reasons for its conclusion. First, Davey was denied the scholarship “because of what he proposed to do.” Second, the Locke Court looked at a “historic and substantial” state interest lacking in the present case: opposition to funding the training of clergy, because of the American tradition opposing such state support. No such interest existed in this case: Unlike the opposition to paying for the training of clergy, many states in the late 18th and early 19th centuries “provided financial support to private schools, including denominational ones.” This, of course, was in part because no public (“common”) schools then existed. Further, any “tradition” of no-aid to religious organizations from the 1870s on was marked by anti-Catholic bigotry. The requirement that newly-created states adopt a “no-aid” provision in their constitutions, called state Blaine Amendments, was due largely to religious prejudice. That Montana re-adopted its no-aid provision in the 1970s, when no such bigotry existed, was not enough to equate its laws with the facts in Locke. Applying strict scrutiny, the no-aid provision was unconstitutional.

The concurrence of Justice Thomas, joined by Justice Gorsuch, urged a reconsideration of the Court’s Nonestablishment Clause jurisprudence, which “continues to hamper free exercise rights.” That reconsideration included an understanding that the Clause should not have been incorporated into the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, or, even if it somehow could be incorporated, was given a “far broader test than the Clause’s original meaning.” That reconsideration should lead the Court to overturn Locke, which “incorrectly interpreted the Establishment Clause and should not impact free exercise challenges.” Justice Alito wrote only to provide a history of Montana’s no-aid provision. The no-aid provision was “modeled on the failed Blaine Amendment,” which “was prompted by virulent prejudice against immigrants, particularly Catholic immigrants.” Justice Gorsuch’s concurrence returned to his concurrence in Trinity Lutheran, arguing that the distinction between religious status and religious use was “destined to yield more questions than answers:” “Does Montana seek to prevent religious parents and schools from participating in a public benefits program (status)? Or does the State aim to bar public benefits from being employed to support religious education?” More importantly, the Free Exercise Clause itself indicated actions, not merely status, as would be the case in which the “right to conscience” rather than the right to free exercise was protected.

Justice Ginsburg dissented, arguing the decision of the Montana Supreme Court did not discriminate, because it abolished the school choice program in its entirety, thus affecting religious and secular public schools in the same fashion. Justice Breyer also dissented. He assumed an “inherent tension between the Establishment and Free Exercise Clauses.” To remedy that tension, he would allow states to exercise “room for play in the joints.” (This is from Walz v. Tax Comm’n, 387 U.S. 664, 669 (1970), a case in which New York’s decision not to tax religious institutions was held constitutional against a Nonestablishment Clause challenge.) Some state actions would be neither forbidden by the Nonestablishment Clause nor required by the Free Exercise Clause. And this is one of those discretionary cases in which the state may choose to aid or not aid parents in sending their children to religiously affiliated schools. Justice Breyer concluded that this case was more similar to Locke than Trinity Lutheran, because the issue was closer to “an essentially religious endeavor.” Justice Sotomayor’s dissent first concluded that the “Court fails to heed Article III principles.” Then she concluded the Court got the substantive answer wrong. As she dissented in Trinity Lutheran, she dissented in Espinoza for similar reasons.

FULTON V. CITY OF PHILADELPHIA, 593 U.S. ___, 141 S. Ct. 1868 (2021) — The Court continued its trend of declaring violative of the Free Exercise Clause state action treating disparately a religious entity compared with similar secular entities. The City of Philadelphia stopped referring children to Catholic Social Services (CSS), a foster care agency, after it learned CSS would not certify same-sex couples as foster parents due to CSS’s “religious beliefs about marriage.” The Court unanimously held Philadelphia’s actions violated CSS’s free exercise of religion.

Chief Justice Roberts’s opinion for the Court chose not to revisit the Court’s decision in Employment Div. v. Smith (1990), which applied rational basis scrutiny to neutral and generally applicable laws that burdened the free exercise of religion. The Court concluded Philadelphia had “burdened the religious exercise of CSS through policies that do not meet the requirement of being neutral and generally applicable.” The Court suggested Philadelphia had not acted neutrally, but relied on the City’s failure to act in a generally applicable manner to declare its actions unconstitutional. The City included a “mechanism for individualized exemptions” from the City’s foster care contracts. Such exemptions must be extended to religious persons or entities unless the City possesses a compelling reason not to do so. A second type of lack of general applicability is to prohibit religious conduct while permitting similar secular conduct that allegedly undermines the state’s asserted interests. The City’s foster care contract permitted its Commissioner, at his sole discretion, to grant exemption from the foster care contract. That included the provision requiring all foster care agencies to serve same-sex couples. Such “individualized” discretionary authority triggered strict scrutiny review. In assessing the City’s claim of compelling interests not to grant CSS an exemption, the Court focused on stated the proper level of generality. “The question, then, is not whether the City has a compelling interest in enforcing its non-discrimination policies generally, but whether it has such an interest in denying an exception to CSS.” On that narrower level of generality, the City’s claim of a compelling interest failed.

A concurring opinion by Justice Barrett began by suggesting Employment Div. v. Smith had likely been wrongly decided. “As a matter of text and structure, it is difficult to see why the Free Exercise Clause—lone among the first Amendment freedoms—offers nothing more than protection from discrimination.” What she did not decide was “what should replace Smith?” She rejected “categorical” regimes requiring either deference (Smith) or strict scrutiny (Sherbert v. Verner). Because the City’s actions allowed individualized exemptions, strict scrutiny applied, and “all nine Justices agree that the City cannot satisfy strict scrutiny.” It was thus not the day to revisit Smith.

Justice Alito, joined by Justices Thomas and Gorsuch, strongly disagreed. In a very lengthy opinion concurring in the judgment, Justice Alito concluded Smith should be revisited, as one of the questions the Court accepted for review, and overruled. Though written by Justice Scalia, a constitutional originalist, Smith “paid shockingly little attention to the text of the Free Exercise Clause.” A textual interpretation of the Free Exercise Clause barred government from “forbidding or hindering unrestrained religious practices or worship.” This “straightforward understanding is a far cry from the interpretation adopted in Smith.” In particular, this understanding “gives a specific group of people (those who wish to engaged in the ‘exercise of religion’) the right to do so without hindrance.” Relatedly, it was not an “equal treatment” (i.e., non-discrimination) provision. The opinion then extensively reviews the history of religious liberty and the Free Exercise Clause and concludes Smith is inconsistent with that history, as well as with its text. It then used the Court’s multi-factor test (also used in Janus v. AFSCME (2018)) to conclude Smith “was wrong decided,” “threatens a fundamental freedom,” and should be overruled. It should be replaced by the rule that a “law that imposes a substantial burden on religious exercise can be sustained only if it is narrowly tailored to serve a compelling interest.” Such a rule might be “rephrased or supplemented with specific rules” in the future.

AFTERWORD

The Court is divided into three, and maybe four, distinctive groups regarding the Free Exercise Clause, which has a spillover effect on the Court’s interpretation of the Nonestablishment Clause. Justices Gorsuch and Thomas would interpret the Free Exercise Clause broadly, which is why they emphasize the Clause protects religious “use” or “actions,” not simply being religious (“status”). In Justice Thomas’s case, his interest is in massively reducing the constitutional footprint of the Nonestablishment Clause. That would in turn allow, in his view, a greater flourishing of Free Exercise Clause liberty. Justice Alito, as demonstrated in his concurrence in Fulton, appears close to this position, although he often assesses Free Exercise Clause claims in light of history. In Trinity Lutheran, Justice Alito assessed the specific history of the Blaine Amendment. Congress required newly-formed Western states to include in their constitutions when applying for admission to the Union to include a “baby” Blaine Amendment. These Amendments demonstrated a large anti-Catholic prejudice. That prejudice makes those state Blaine Amendments a target for constitutional challenges. A second group is led by Chief Justice Roberts. He is ready to carve out additional Free Exercise protections without making large changes in existing Religion Clause jurisprudence, as demonstrated most recently in his opinion for the Court in Fulton. The Court’s opinion by Chief Justice Roberts in Trinity Lutheran restricts the impact of Locke v. Davey. It can do so first, by limiting Locke to a type of “use” case, as it did in Trinity Lutheran. Thus, when the discrimination (as occurred in both Trinity Lutheran and Espinoza) is characterized as “status” discrimination (who you are v. what you do), that makes Locke inapt. Second, the Court further limits Locke by noting the historic importance of the state’s interest in not funding the training the clergy. One problem with this second limitation on Locke is its level of generality. Although the historical record is quite complex, it’s clear that some states in the early national era wanted to be out of the business of aiding religion, not merely out of the business of aiding the training of clergy. That former level of generality is closer to the no-aid principle. He is joined by Justices Kavanaugh and Barrett as part of an “institutionalist” group, which prefers unanimity (Fulton and Masterpiece Cakeshop) or something close to that if it means limiting the breadth of the Court’s decision.

Justice Breyer is part of a third group in the Court. He prefers a relatively modest Free Exercise Clause joined by a modest Nonestablishment Clause. That would leave state governments with large swaths of discretion to allow or prohibit certain interactions with religion. That is the reason for the emphasis on the “play in the joints.” Justice Kagan appears similarly inclined. Finally, Justice Sotomayor’s position is that Free Exercise Clause has a relatively limited breadth and is joined by a broad Nonestablishment Clause.

The Roberts Court avoided any re-assessment of Employment Division v. Smith (again, which applies to laws characterized as neutral and generally applicable) because it characterizes the government’s actions as discriminatory (Trinity Lutheran, Masterpiece Cakeshop, and Espinoza) or as an exceptional (Hosanna-Tabor and Our Lady of Guadalupe School ministerial exception). As a result, the Court has not attempted any transformational changes to the Free Exercise Clause. Thus, the contours of the Clause remain substantially undefined.

CHART 9-2

